By Philip Webster, Political Reporter

A potential hazard was removed from Mrs Margaret Thatcher's path yesterday when the Stuttgart summit of European Community heads of government, planned for June 6 to 7, was postponed nntil after the general election.

It was also confirmed that the Prime Minister would attend the western economic summit at Williamsburg, Virginia, during the spring bank holiday weekend in the middle of the campaign. But her visit will be even shorter than expected.

Mrs Thatcher, accompanied hy Mr Francis Pym, the Foreign Secretary, and Sir Geoffrey Howe, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will fly hy VC 10 to Williamsburg for the opening of the summit on the afternonn of Saturday, May 28. She will return to Britain the following evening, leaving Sir Geoffrey and Mr Pym to represent the Government at the Monday session, immediately after which they will fly back.

It is expected, though not confirmed by Downing Street, that Mrs Thatcher will return on an ordinary scheduled flight.

The postponement for two weeks of the Stuttgart summit by Dr Helmut Kohl, West German Chancellor and president of the Council of Ministers, was welcomed by Mrs Thatcher hut it was emphasized on her behalf that she had not requested it.

If it had gone ahead the summit would have been discussing, 48 hours before the election, the question of Britain's 1983 rebate from the Community budget, and the more complex issue of long-term ehanges to the budget structure.

No agreement was guaranteed and it is known that some of the Prime Minister's advisers were worried at the prospect of so unpredictable a meeting taking place close to polling day.

A failure to obtain the expected rebate would have been seized by the Labour Party as ammunition for its EEC withdrawal policy, and Mrs Thatcher would have been criticised for not defending Britain's interests.

Mr Denis Healey, Labour's deputy leader, anticipated the postponement yesterday morning at his party's press conference when he accused the Prime Minister of "committing every professional foul in the book" to put off announcements of bad news until after June 9.

"Because there is no chance of the Common Market giving ber the rebate she said she had already been promised, the Government is begging them to put off the Common Market summit too." he said.

Before yesterday's formal announcement of the postponement, Mrs Thatcher had indicated to reporters that she would not have gone. It would have been extremely difficult to leave the country in the last week of the campaign. "A general does not leave the field of battle when coming up to the climax", she said.

Heseltine renews CND attack

By Nicholas Timmins

Mr Michael Heseltine, Secretary of State for Defence, yesterday returned to his attack on the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament as an organization led and dominated by the left.

In a letter to Conservative candidates, he said CND had reacted with indignation to his statement that most of the elected council members were of the left or the extreme left, "but they did not deny the figures that lay behind my statement".

"It now emerges that a clear majority of the executive which is the body which meets monthly to run CND is also of the left, whether Labour, socialist or communist". It was clear "beyond question that they are led hy men and women of the left".

The CND's general election pack, sent to local groups, was "transparently designed to focus the CND attack nn the Conservative Party"

It was specifically hostile to the Prime Minister "and its sympathies are clearly revealed hy the conclusion that "the possibility that Labour would do substantially worse vis-a-vis the Conservatives than in 1979 is too awful to contemplate".

The document admitted that CND had lost the argument for one-sided disarmament, he said, advising its activists to concentrate on the deployment of Cruise and Trident, "where they think the puhlic will give them a better hearing".

Monsignor Bruce Kent, general secretary of CND, said last night Mr Heseltine was overreaching himself in his attacks on CND. "Last time nf the 14 people he named the only crime nine of them had committed was simply being members of the Labour Party".

The letter, he said, was "silly", implying CND's activities were secret. The campaign's aim was cnmplete nuclear disarmament, hut Cruise and Trident were the immediate prinrities.

Healey's new line on Polaris

By Anthony Bevins, Political Correspondent

Mr Denis Healey yesterday suggested that the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament supported his new definition of Labour's non-nuclear defence policy; the refusal to use nuclear weapons as a first-strike defence.

Labour's deputy leader said for the first time at the start of the election campaign that a Labour government would only renounce Polaris "if we got adequate concessions from the Soviet Union". He said that he was doubtful about Labour commitments to eut defence spending because they would increase reliance on nuclear weapons. A non-nuclear defence policy, he added, meant "a conventional deterrent against conventional attack.

Having already stated views that would have certainly embarrassed Mr Font, Mr Healey rubbed salt into the policy wound at the party's daily election press conference in London, when he cited the views of CND in aid of his argument.

Asked by The Times: "How do you have a non-nuclear defence policy if you maintain Polaris?" Mr Healey said: "Our purpose is to mnve the whole of the (Western) Alliance towards a policy which does not depend on the first use of nuclear weapons."

Mr Healey: Rubbed salt in policy wounds

He was then asked whether he could define the differences between a non-nuclear defence policy and a policy of nio first-use.

Mr Healey said: "I think everybody concedes, CND certainly does, that the major danger of nuclear war consists in the ennrmnus armaments piled up by the Soviet Union and the United States, which are being added to all the time; a process which we want to reverse.

"What the Labour Party supports is organizing Nato strategy so that we can deter a massive Soviet conventinnal attack without requiring to threaten the first use of nuclear weapons".

SNP claims victory likely in 12 seats

The Scottish Nationalist Party began their electinn campaign yesterday with a claim that they were poised for victory in more than a dozen seats north of the border. The claim was made by the party leader Mr Gordon Wilson, and former MP for Dundee, east, in Edinburgh.

The SNP at present has only twn MPs, compared with the 11 they had until the 1979 general election, and the party has in the last year been troubled by internal bickering.

However, Mr Wilson says support for Scottish independence is higher now than in the 1970s, and Scots were realizing that only a Scottish government could solve their country's problems. He added that Scotland had to "play the Nationalist card" to win the fight against the destructinn nf its econnmy.

New threat by water workers

A new strike threat from the water and sewage workers emerged yesterday at the National Union of Public Employees' conference nt Scarborough.

Delegates representing 10,000 Nupe water workers said there could be another national strike if the Government went ahead with plans to abolish the industry's national negotiating machinery.

They were promised full backing by Nupe executive, which considers the water workers to be leading the fight against decentralization.

In January the 29,000 water workers started a five-week strike before winning a 12 per cent rise. They fear now that if the Conservatives win the election they will press ahead with decentralizing their pay machinery.

Delegates, who said their members were determined to protect their bargaining process. Unanimously approved a joint motion from branches in southwest England, Lancashire and Yorkshire.

It said that if the National Water Council is dissolved the three unions in the industry, Nupe, the General Municipal and Boilermakers' and the Transport and General Workers', should work with the "utmost urgency" for the establishment of an alternative national body.

The resolution added: "In the event of this not being conceded, the unions of the National Joint Industrial Council shnuld consider all-out industrial action to achieve this important objective".

Mr Rodney Rodney Bickerstaffe, Nupe's general secretary, promised the executive's full support. "Decentralization of wage negotiations is a major plank of this Government's antiunion policy", be said.

Water workers' leaders have already decided on one line of attack if decentralization takes place. They will agree a national claim, then lodge the claim on a region by region basis.

The employers are understood to be divided about the merits of abolishing the machinery.

From Mario Modiano
Athens

If the British Museum decides to return the Elgin Marbles to Greece in the next decade, there may be no Parthenon to put the sculptures back on. Preliminary work has just begun on an ambitious project to dismantle the Parthenon stone by stone, then reassemble it after replacing the rusty iron clamps used by earlier restorers to hold the structure together.

The project will take 12 years. The Greek Government intends to consult foreign experts by organizing an international symposium where they will air their views and scrutinize the detailed plans.

This was the procedure followed in the case of the Erechtheion, the second of the three classical temples on the Acropolis of Athens. Work here is still in progress. All architectural members are being freed from the iron joints and brackets, which have caused the marble heavy delapidation.

These are now being replaced with supports made of titanium alloy which is not supposed to rust. The five caryatids were taken to the museum for protection, and were provisionally replaced by cement copies.

The air pollution of Athens is the principal reason for the removal of priceless sculptures indoors. This is one of the reasons why, even if the British Museum returned its half of the Parthenon frieze, it cannot be placed back in position. Greek experts have been considering the possible transfer of the existing eastern frieze nf the Parthenon to the museum.

● LONDON: A new British pressure group yesterday demanded the Elgin Marbles in the British Museum must be returned to Greece, Christopher Warman writes.

The British Committee for the Restitution nf the Parthenon Marbles state; "Quite clearly a wrong has been done. It is not always that wrongs can be righted but mercifully this one can. The Marbles have been carefully kept in the British Museum. They must be returned when Greece is ready to receive them.

Miss Melina Mercouri, the Greek Minister of Culture, is visiting London this weekend, and will not lose the chance of emphasizing her determinatation for their return.

Go back or factory shuts, BL men told

By Barrie Clement, Labour Reporter

British Leyland yesterday warned 1,300 workers on strike at the Albion axle plant in Glasgow that the factory would be closed for good unless there was a return to work.

In a tactic often used by Sir Michael Edwardes when he was company chairman, Mr Ronald Hancock, head of Leyland Vehicles, wrote to the strikers, threatening closure unless normal production was resumed by Monday.

The letter discloses that the company is less than 20 volunteers short of the 146-job cutback it is seeking. The men walked out because Mr Hancock refused to rule out the possibility of compulsory severance.

He said in the letter that the chances were high that the shortfall would by filled by volunteers in the seven weeks remaining. The union convener had told him there was no need to call a mass meeting and no need to call off the strike.

The plant, which makes axles for the Leyland Truck works at Bathgate, near Edinburgh, and Leyland in Lancashire, had been at a standstill for more than a week.

The company had announced that vehicle assembly at those two plants would stop on Friday, with thousands of layoffs next week.

Mr Hancock wrote: "... I am not prepared to stand by and allow you to place in danger the jobs of 10,000 employees and the future of Leyland Trucks. It is vital that a mass meeting is held at the latest by Friday and that you return to work no later than next Monday."

He said that other axle makers were "hammering on the door" and once customers had found other suppliers there would be no question of winning them back again.

Mr James McLean, union convener, accused BL of "industrial gangsterism" and indicated that his members would continue to fight compulsory redundancies.

● Sir Austin Bide, chairman of BL, yesterday said that the recent four-week long washing-up strike which affected production at the Cowley plant does not herald a return to the "bad old days" of industrial relations within the state-owned company. (David Young writes).

Industrial relations generally in BL continue to be sound, he told the shareholders' annual meeting, with cooperation by tho employees achieving vital productivity increases, leading to workers earning improved bonus payments.

"In 1982 we had another good year of industrial relations.

Israel and Lebanon sign pact on troops

From Christopher Walker
Khalde

For only the second time in 35 years, Israel yesterday signed a direct agreement with one of its Arab neighbours. But the sense of both history and relief were overshadowed by fears that the pact with Lebanon might never be implemented and instead, be superseeded by a new war with Syria.

Fear of retaliation by Syria's heavily-armed sympathizers in Lebanon dominated the first of the day's two signing ceremonies which took place amid conditions of the strictest security at the desolate, shell-scarred Beach Hotel in the battered Lebanese resort of Khalde.

Warships of the American Sixth Fleet loomed symbolically through the morning haze as representatives of Israel, Lebanon and the US made their way into the hotel through a cordon of guards, and the building was ringed with armoured vehicles.

Inside the hotel, Dr David Kimche, Israel's chief delegate added a section to his prepared speech in which he appealed directly to both the Lebanese and American Governments to persuade Syria to withdraw its troops. Israel has made clear that without such a move the newly signed pact will be indefintely "suspended".

"We must not allow the spoilers and the enemies of peace to have their way", he said. "For too long, they have marred the beauty of the land of the cedars. We expect you to make every effort to get them out."

His Lebanese opposite number, the veteran diplomat Mr Antoine Fattal, spoke in philosophical vein. "Lebanon intends to remain faithful to its Arab vocation, in spite of the hazards, while ending the state of war with Israel. There is no contradiction there", he said, adding in a pointed aside directed at Syria that inter-Arab solidarity did not impel Lebanon to copy its neighbours' behaviour."

The agreement provides for Israeli troops to leave Lebanon within three months. But yesterday for the Israeli troops on maximum alert outside the seedy hotel dining room where the first signing session took place there seemed little chance of a quick retreat.

The festive atmosphere of the second signing ceremony an hour later in the Israeli border town of Kiryat Shmona, until last year a frequent target of Palestinian rocket attacks, came in marked contrast.

The streets were filled with balloon-waving children who had been assiduously encouraged by the Israeli authorities to turn out in force to hail what many on the Begin Government liked to describe as something close to a de facto peace treaty

Woman is feared drowned

A woman was missing and feared drowned last night after being swept away in the flood-swollen Tywi, near Llanwrtyd Wells in mid-Wales.

The woman, and Mr Roger Vlitos, aged 32, a photographer, of Carreg Cennen, Trapp, Llandeilo, Dyfed, had been trying to cross the fast-flowing river when she slipped into the rushing water.

Mr Vlitos made an attempt to save her. He was swept 500 yards before he managed to cling to a rock in the middle of the river.

He was seen by a holidaymaker, who raised the alarm and a rescue helicopter from RAF Brawdy flew to the scene. The crew managed to winch Mr Vlitos on board and he was flown to hospital in Carmarthen with back injuries and shock.

The helicopter crew searched the river for miles without finding any trace of the missing woman. Twenty police officers were continuing the search for her.

Recovery hopes hit by 1pc fall in output

By Frances Williams, Economics Correspondent

Government claims that an economic recovery is underway received a setback yesterday when the last estimates of industrial production to be published before the election showed an almost 1 per cent drop in March.

The figures were immediately seized on by Mr Len Murray, TUC general secretary, who said they "give the lie to all the exaggerated and over-optimistic claims about an industrial and economic recovery."

But comparisons for the last three months, a more reliable guide to trends, show that total output in the first quarter of this year was 1.5 per cent higher than in the final quarter of last year and 2 per cent more than in the same period the year before. The Confederation of British Industry said yesterday that the trend for manufacturing industry was still upwards, with 1.5 per cent growth between the two latest quarters.

Since the Government took office four years ago, however, total industrial production has fallen by 11.6 per cent and manufacturing output by a huge 18.5 per cent.

Shortage of opera singers

Sir Colin Davis, musical director of the Royal Opera House said yesterday that he was concerned at the shortage of opera singers compared with 15 years ago (Our Arts Correspondent writes). He was replying to criticisms of the poor standard of some productions.

With many opera houses, there was a much greater demand for singers who, because of high fees on offer, were in danger of doing too much and burning themselves out, he said.

Sir Colin suggested that the long-term development of singers seemed to have gone out of the window, since the younger yoo were the more fashionable you were. But he also believed the talent was not there.

Controls jam caused air crash

An inquest jury at Hull yesterday returned verdicts of death by misadventure on a Yorkshire Television cameraman and a director who died when their helicopter plunged into the River Humber on March 14.

The helicopter was being used to make a programme when it hit the mast of the German tanker MV Zussow and plunged into the river. 18 are arrested in hunt for wife abducted by INLA

From Richard Ford, Belfast

Eighteen people were arrested in Belfast and co Armagh yesterday by police searching for Mrs Elizabeth Kirkpatrick, who was abducted by the Irish National Liberation Army oo Monday.

They included: Mr James Brown, chairman of the Irish Republican Socialist Party, the political wing of the INLA, who is understood to be considering standing in the general election; Mr Sean Flynn, who is already facing a charge of INLA membership; and Mrs Suzanne Bunting, whose husband, a former commanding officer of the INLA, was murdered in 1980.

They were held as a widespread search began for Mrs Kirkpatrick, aged 24, who was taken from her parents' home in Ballymurphy, west Belfast, to try to stop her husband, Mr Henry Kirkpatrick, aged 25, from the Divis Flats, becoming an informer.

A statement by INLA gave a warning that they would not hesitate to "take whatever actioo was oecessary" against Mrs Kirkpatrick. And as fears for her safety grew the outlawed organization demanded that Mr Kirkpatrick be allowed to see his solicitor and mix freely with other rebublican prisoners.

Mr Kirkpatrick has been on remand in Crumlin Road jail since last February accused of five murders and 61 other serious offences.

The missing woman's family were reluctant to talk yesterday, but one relative said: "We cannot say much. We just hope and pray we will see her again safe and well".

The abduction is the latest effort by republican paramilitary groups to bring crude pressure on people in custody who have given information to detectives.

Last August Mrs Fiona Brown disappeared from her home in west Belfast, but when her husband retracted earlier statements she appeared at a press conference organized by Provisional Sinn Fein, the political wing of the IRA. Mrs Brown said she had been staying with friends.

In November Mr Patirck Gilmour, aged 61, was abducted from his home in Londooderry after his son Raymond turned informer, which led to 71 people being charged. In spite of pleas for his release, Mr Gilmour has oot been seen since, hut, it is believed he is being held in co Donegal.

● Dr Tiede Herrema, aged 62, who was kidnapped by Eddie Gallagher and Marion Coyle in 1975 and held for 36 days at Monasterevan, is to return to live in Dublin after he retires this year.

Dr Herrema said he would not settle permanently in Ireland, but would spend as much time as possible in the country with which he said he had an emitional tie since the abduction.

Red alert for the Melbourne Grove home guard

The private army of self-styled Major-General Barry Nuttall was at battle stations in Hull yesterday as the deadline passed for it to vacate its headqnarters.

The men, dressed as American and British soldiers, complete with tin hats, were expecting an invasion by council bailiffs, but the noon deadline slipped by and the uneasy peace of Melbourne Grove remained unbroken.

Mr Nottall, aged 34, and 29 members of his Northern Allied Axis War Games Society were barricaded behind doors, tyres and rubble in the dilapidated row of terrace houses which are the subject of a compulsory purchase order. A tattered Union Jack flew overhead.

The men were ready to defeod their headquarters with rotten eggs, flour bombs and rock cakes. But they had no use for their weapons. Two bailiffs arrived, checked the barricades and left. Mr Gilbert Baitson, a High Court Sheriff, did the same.

Mr Nuttall, a lorry driver, has been fighting for five years to save his home. The local council has bought most of the other houses in the street and wants to demolish them to make a car park.

The society stages mock battles for charity and many of the rooms in the house are packed with memorabilia.

Mr Nuttall said yesterday: "My father and I own two houses in this street. The council has offered us £3,400 for the pair. It is daylight robbery, and we are not going to let them get away with it".

He has been offered a new house near by, but has refused it because there is nowhere to park his Second World War military vehicles.

He said he had seen a house with a large garden which would suit his family and the society.

Science report

New find may be heaviest particle

Scientists at the European Centre for Nuclear Research (Cern), near Geneva, may have discovered the heaviest elementary particle yet known, the "neutral intermediate vector boson", or Z° for short.

Although the Cern team are not daring to make a public announcement, an "internal statement" is circulating at Cern which says that a Z° is "the most likely interpretation" of the results of recent experiment. If that interpretation is correct, the Z° decayed rapidly into an electron and a positron (an anti-electron), and weighed about 100 times as much as a hydrogen atom.

The Z° might be described as a heavy photon, a heavy particle of light. However, the "light" of which the Z° is the particle is not the same light that we see with our eyes. Ordinary light is radiation resulting from the shaking of electric charges; the Z° results from the shaking of a different kind of charge, called a "weak" charge.

The radiation from electric charges causes electrical forces; the radiation from weak charges causes weak forces. On the whole electric forces bind atoms together; on the whole weak forces cause long-term atomic decay.

According to the "unified field theory" of Professor Abdus Salam and Professor Steven Weinberg, the two kinds of charge are really aspects of the same thing and the weakness of the weak force is entirely the result of the large mass of the Z° particle.

Its great mass has the effect of reducing the range of the weak force, which, therefore, is tangible over only fractions of a nuclear diameter. The photon, by contrast, is massless, and the corresponding electrical forces have infinite range.

The great excitement about the new discovery, if it so proves, is that it begins to provide a sharp test of the Salam-Weinberg theory. A few months ago Dr Carlo Rubbia and his "UA1" collaboration at Cern, which includes British physicists, discovered the slightly lighter partners of the Z°, the W+ and W-. An exact mass ratio between the W-particles and the Z° is predicted by the theory, so a test of the theory is possible.

However, the test is more accurate the better the masses are known, and the masses are better known the more examples of W and Z° decays there are. So far Dr Rubbia and his team have about teo W decays and only a single Z° decay. That is enough to give an indication that the theory is about right but not enough to make a precise test.

As the experiment continues, however, it should yield more and more W and Z° particles and so become an inceasingly stringent test of the theory.

Dr Rubbia's group would like to have three or four more examples of Z° production and decay before it is certain enough to make an official announcement, particularly since the one event they have observed has some slight pecularities which make it not the best case on which to stake a reputation.

Revised forecasts 'back BA's case on Stansted'

British Airways claimed yesterday that Government forecasts on the growth of air travel supported the airline's case that Stansted would become "an expensive white elephant" if developed as Londoo's third airport.

Instead a fifth terminal at Heathrow could be built in plenty of time to meet the growth, which would not come until the end of the century, a spokesman said.

Department of Trade forecasts, revised downwards since they were submitted to the continuing inquiry on the development of Stansted or the creation of a fifth Heathrow terminal, now estimated London area passengers at betweeo 68 and 92 millions in the year 2000, in line with British Airways' forecast of 84 millions, be said.

For 1995 there had been a drop of between four and seven millions in the government forecast, revised to between 61 and 77 millions, compared with British Airways' 66 millions.

With existing terminals at Heathrow, Gatwick, Lntoo and Stansted capable of small increases, British Airways claimed that an extra 15-million passenger terminal at Heathrow could handle all the growth needed into the oext century.

The Department of Trade commented on its revised forecasts for air passengers: "They are revised oot so much downwards as delaying the growth for a few years".

London homes burden

By Baron Phillips, Property Correspondent

First-time buyers of homes within the Greater London area need an income of almost £10,000 a year to be able to get their foot on the property ladder. Outside London the average first-time buyer's income falls to under £7,000 a year in areas such as east Midlands and Northern Ireland.

Generally young buyers in London need mortgages of more than £9,000 higher then people in other parts of the country. Average prices of homes bought by first-time buyers in the capital are more than £33,000, £5,000 higher than in the South-East and almost twice the cost of purchasing a home in Wales, the North, Yorkshire, Humberside and the East Midlands.

Those are the latest statistics released by the Abbey National Building Society, which show that in the first three months of the year house prices across the country rose by 1.7 per cent. But since the figures were compiled there has been an upsurge in demand, which suggests higher increases during the second quarter.

The latest issue of Abbey National's Homes comments that there have been large regional disparities in house price rises during the first quarter of the year. Britain's industrial areas have beeo leading the field, with the largest increase recorded in the North, where prices surged by more than 7 per cent, and the East Midlands, which showed a 6 per cent gain, and Yorkshire and Humberside with a 5 per cent advance.

Only in three reggions did prices fall: Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, where prices dipped by as much as 5 per cent in the first three months.

Areas such as Greater London and the South-east show gains of between 10 and 12 percent since the same time a year ago, although Abbey indicates a mild hitch in price rises in the first part of the year.

The society estimates the average price for a home is £26,201, compared with £25,783 at the end of 1982. But the society adds: "there is no clear evidence of a price boom

Murder by Jaguar charge

Rebecca Anne Howarth, a school girl, was killed a few days before her seventeenth birthday when a Jaguar car was deliberately driven at her in a car park in Bournemouth, Winchester Crown Court was told yesterday.

"The girl was carried 20 to 30ft oo the bonnet of the car before being pitched off oo to the tarmac", Mr David Webster, QC, for the prosecution, said. Her friend, Paul Gary Green, aged 18 was injured in the attack.

Thomas Robert Barrett, aged 30, a builder, of Waverley Road, Reading, is charged with the murder of Miss Howarth, of Derby Road, South Woodford, Essex, between August 28 and September 4 last year, the attempted murder of Mr Green, a fishcurer, of Albert Road, Ilford, on August 29 and with wounding Mr Green with intent to cause grievous bodily harm. He pleads not guilty.

Mr Webster said a party of young people from Essex had come to Bournemouth for the weekend. About 3 am some of them went to the beach, then returned to the car park. A blue Jaguar driven by Mr Barrett came into the car park.

"Suddenly there was the screaming of tyres and the Jaguar came fast up the car park to where some of the young people were standing," Mr Webster said. "It appeared to be heading straight towards them."

The car hit Mr Green and the girl, knocking them into the air. Mr Green fell sideways to the ground, but the girl was carried on the bonnet. She died in hospital without gaining coosciousness.

Mr Barrett allegedly told the police that his friend had been mugged earlier that evening and he thought the people in the car park had something to do with it.

The hearing continues today.

Nalgo rejects 4½% and plans action

By Barrie Clement, Labour Reporter

Leaders of the National and Local Government Officers Associatioo yesterday rejected a 4½ per cent pay offer and decided to draw up plans for industrial action.

The union representatives will meet employers again today to press their claim for rises of between 8.3 and 26.9 per cent for their 80,000 members. Civil Service unions recently accepted 4.9 per cent.

A delegate conference in Loodon yesterday instructed the executive of the union to draw up plans for action if there were no "substantial improvement" in the offer. The new deal would have to be ready by the next conference, on June 13 at Douglas, Isle of Man.

The union's national committee made oo redommendations for industrial action to the meeting yesterday, hut later agreed to an amendment put forward by the Islington branch.

The delegates' meeting rejected proposals to referer the dispute to arbitration and also rejected a proposal that there should be a strike of Nalgo members involved in the general electioo count.

● The antagonism between leaders of the right-wing Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers and their white-collar staff has increased, with the clerical and administrative employees being offered a "take it or leave it" pay rise of 4½ per cent.

The executive of the unioo has so far refused to meet senior staff to negotiate. Recently the national council of the million-member unioo voted unanimously to award the executive a 6 per cent pay increase plus the consolidation of a £200 expense allowance with other benefits.

Garden find is sold for £4,840

By Geraldine Norman

A piece of Celtic bronze harness dng up in a garden in Reading was sold at Sotheby's yesterday for £4,840 (estimate £2,000-3,000). It is a semicircular bronze terret, measuring 3½ in and decorated with red and yellow anamels.

A terret was a ring attached to horse trappings through which the reins passed. This one dates from about the first century AD.

It was discovered by Mr S R Ott 18 years ago when digging a oew driveway at his home in Shrublands Drive, off Burfield Road. The family thought at first that it was a gypsy ornament and hung it on ther garden gate.

They took it later to Reading Museum, where it was indentified as a Celtic terret. It was the news that another terret dng up in Norfolk had been sold for £17,600 last December that persuaded them to try to sell.

Sotheby's sale of antiquities totalled £202,086, with 20 per cent left unsold. A big surprise was a price of £14,850 (estimate £3,000-£4,000) paid by Ars Antiqua, of Switzerland, for a Roman marble relief of the "Rape of the Sabines". It measures more than seven feet and dates from about the second century AD.

The top price was $30,800 (estimate $30,000-$50,000) or £19,371, paid by David Caplan, a Tokyo dealer, for a mica print by Sharaku, a portrait of Ichikawa Monnosuke II, the actor.

Lord Silsoe, QC, for the board, told the inquiry at Snape, Suffnlk, that the modificaoons required by the inspectorate, the Governmeat's safety watchdog, could cost as mnch as £31m.

ILEA puts Scouts on trial

By Lucy Hodges
Educatioo Correspondent

The Scout movement in London is to be subjected to a two-month review to ensure that it is free from sexism, racism and all other discrimination. Some grants are to be witheld until the investigation is complete.

The review was agreed by the Inner London Education Authority's education committee yesterday in a debate punctuated by abuse from rival members.

Mr David Avery, Conservative deputy leader of the authority, claimed the Greater London Council's Labour administration disliked the voluntary youth sector. He said Labour councillors should have left any decision about the Scouts until they had reviewed all the other uniformed youth groups.

But a Conservative amendment to overturn the decision to review the Scout movement was defeated and a censure motion against Mr Avery was carried by 35 votes to 12. Labour members resented the fact that he had talked to the press about an alleged grant application form in which Scout groups were required to state whether their leaders were homosexual.

Mr Neil Fletcher, chairman of the further and higher education subcommittee, said oo such form existed, and Mr Avery had accepted that.

The controversy about the Scouts began last December when Mr Fletcher took exception to remarks made by Major-General Michael Walsh, the oew Chief Scout, calling for more drilling, marching and standing to attention for his members.

Bird's-eye view of Britain

By Hugh Clayton, Environment Correspondent

A poll taken of more than 1,000 people over the age of 16 reveals what the British people consider very important in their everyday lives. More than four out of five listed good health, family life and steady jobs.

Nearly n half chose money, food and drink. Fewer than a quarter selected sport, religion and success, and only one in 10 picked politics, which came bottom of the poll, in twenty-third place. A fifth of those polled considered that politics was not at all important in their lives.

The Gallup poll, published yesterday, which was commissioned by Birds Eye Walls, also showed that most people thought frozen food looked and tasted better than tinned prodncts.

The survey found that a tenth of working wives did not know their husbands' income. Most families spent more than £50 a week on housekeeping, but more than 10 per cent of married women received less than £30 a week from their husbands.

Birds Eye Walls commented: "Britain in 1983 is a rather sober society in which most of the traditional values stand firm".

Battle of designs

Fat-line frigate challenge to Navy

By Rodney Cowton, Defence Correspondent

Detailed proposals for development work on n "short, fat" frigate, which is challenging the traditional long, narrow lines of Royal Navy ships, are to be submitted to the Ministry of Defence by the end of this week.

An independent firm of naval architects, Thornycroft Giles and Asociates, have been advancing the claims of its short, fat S-90 design for years, but the issue is rapidly developing into a competition between it and the navy's planned new Type-23 anti-submarine warfare frigate.

The Type-23 design was produced by the Navy's Ship Design and Engineering Establishment at Bath, and is being further developed under contract by Vosper Thornycroft at Gosport, and Yarrow, on Clydeside.

Mr Kenneth Rawson, chief naval architect and deputy director of ship design and engineering at Bath, is seeking early retirement from the Civil Service to return to academic life as professor of design technology at Brunel University, Uxbridge.

Mr Rawson aged 56, told The Times that the offer of the appointment at Brunel University had come "out of the blue" about six weeks ago. He had to take it up on July 1, if he could secure his release from the Civil Service in time.

He denied that he was leaving because of the controversy over the Type-23 and the S-90. However, he refused to comment when asked whether he felt he had received adequate ministerial backing. The Ministry of Defence said there had been no lack of support from ministers, who were reluctant to see him go.

The Type-23 is intended to reduce the trend of rising costs of naval vessels, though it is expected to cost about £100m, against the £75m talked of about a year ago.

Mr Rawson said he thought it would be an exceedingly good ship. Long, narrow designs of ships were preferable to short, fat ones "if what you want is fuel economy, good speed and good sea-keeping".

His advice to ministers had been clear, "that I think many of the claims made for the S-90 have been exaggerated".

There appears to have been some convergence between the two schools of thought. Typically frigates have had a length to beam ratio of 9 or 10 to 1, but according to the Ministry of Defence the Type-23 would be about 7.75 to 1, against about 5.7 to 1 for the S-90.

For some weeks Thornycroft Giles has been waiting for the results of validation tests on its S-90 design, which have been carried out using a one-twentieth scale model in a tank. The results became available last week.

Mr David Giles, a director of Thornycroft Giles, told The Times that in almost every respect the results had been better than their estimates. The design offered the prospect of providing the Royal Navy with more ships of greater effectiveness for less money.

Mr Giles has been incensed by the leaking of the unenthusiastic opinion of the Hull Committee of the Defence Scientific Advisory Council, after a presentation he made in March.

He says their criticisms cover points which could not be dealt with at the present relatively early stage of the design work on the S-90, and which could not be verified without the results of the tank tests, which were not known in March.

Mr Giles would not give the potential cost of an S-90, but on the basis of weapons and sensors costing about £40m, he seems to be thinking in terms of a total construction and equipment cost of about £65m.

One criticism made of the S-90 is that it would need greater power and be more expensive to operate at high speed. Mr Giles replies that preliminary tests showed that it could achieve 28 knots at full load with 45,000 hp. That compared with their earlier estimates that it would require 46,000 hp and criticisms which suggested that 60,000 hp would be needed. He conceded that it would be slightly less economical at full speed that conventional naval ships.

Thornycroft Giles and its industrial supporters are hoping that on the basis of the propsals it is presenting to the Ministry of Defence it will award a contract to develop further its design.

Prime's referee claims security report uses her as scapegoat

By John Witherow

Miss Dorothea Barsby last night denied allegations made in the Security Commission report that she had protected Geoffrey Prime from exposure as a Soviet spy nine years before he was finally caught.

In a blistering attack on the report, published last week, she said she was "angry, hurt, outraged and disgusted" that she had been accused of "disgraceful" behaviour and said it was a whitewash to cover up for the incompetence of the Security Services.

Miss Barsby appeared at a news conference with her solicitor, Mr Michael Rubinstein, after avoiding making any statements for five days. She also refuted an allegatioo in the report that she had been told by Mrs Helena Prime that her husband was a spy before she, Miss Barsby, had acted as a referee for Prime.

She also said that when Mr. Prime, who was an old friend, told her that Prime had admitted to spying in 1973, she dismissed it as of no consequence because it came after one of the frequent rows between the couple.

She added that she had been a "reluctant referee because I didn't like Prime. I had no idea I was being used as a referee for a man wo was engaged in top security service work."

The Security Commissioo report said that Miss Barsby, who is in her thirties, was told by Mrs Prime in 1973 of Prime's treachery, but did not reveal it when questioned during his vetting process.

But Miss Barsby said yesterday that this conversation took place after the questioning by an investigating officer and was merely hearsay.

Asked about the Security Commission's statement that she bad beeo told that Prime had said he was spying before she acted as a referee, she said: "That is not true. I was told afterwards and it seemed mere hearsay."

"What woman in her right mind would denouce her friend's husband on hearsay evidence? By trying to pin the blame for the failure of the Security Services to catch Prime on me, the Security Commission have failed to protect a law-abiding and loyal citizen of this country in order to protect the Security Services.

The Government has endorsed and adopted an incompetent report, uncaring of its consequences, and have accused me – an innocent person – without giving me a chance to clear my name."

Miss Barsby said she was interviewed by Prime's investigating officer, whom she described as a bowler-hatted "old-fashioned city clerk" who spent most of the time talking about me, which I could not see the poiot of.

She said she had been questioned in February of this year, by two men of the Ministry of Defence, one of whom was a lawyer, but she and Mr Rubinstein, who had also been present, had not been told that the conversation would be misreported to the Security Commission.

"The Security Commission published their report when it could not be debated in Parliament – maybe it was a coincidence," Miss Barsby said, reading from a written statement.

"What is not in doubt is the damage it has done to me, to my family, my friends and my new business, which I have just started. Only the Security Services have benefited from this report.

"They tried to make out that it was all my fault for not having done their job for them. It is just a deplorable whitewash. Their only point is that it is not their fault. It is mine. They are using me as a scapegoat for their poor record and as an excuse for bringing in the lie-detector. They probably need one."

Miss Barsby said she intended to try to return to normal life and get on with her new business of selling hamburgers at country fairs.

BR chief aims to run London radio

By Kenneth Gosling

Capital Radio is to be challenged for the London commercial radio general and entertainment contract by a consortium headed by Sir Peter Parker, who retires as chairman of the British Railways Board in September.

He has been appointed chairman of Metropolitan Radio Ltd, whose managing director is Mr Robert Kennedy, a director until early last year of Capital Radio and of eight other independent radio stations.

Sir Peter said yesterday that he was glad to be part of "this important new development" and the service it was planning for London.

Mr Kennedy is an experienced local broadcasters. He managed the BBC's first local stations in Leicester, was a member of the Independent Broadcasting Authority's senior staff when independent radio began and for five years was managing director of Standard Broadcasting Corp (UK) Ltd.

He will be joined on the Metropolitan board by Lady Ewart-Biggs, an active Labour peeress and widow of Mr Christopher Ewart-Biggs, who was British Ambassador to Dublin; Mr Roy Evans, a lawyer and freelaned writer, who came to this country from Jamaica in the early 1960s and is involved with tenant and community groups in inner London; Mr Alan Parker, the film director and writer, who won international awards for such films as Bugsy Malone and Midnight Express; Mr Peter Benton, who was deputy chairman of British Telecom until his retirement last March; and Mr Clive Lindley, chairman of the independent radion station serving Cheltenham and Gloucester and of LCI Group Ltd, a substantial private company with interests throughout the UK.

The contract, held by Capital since 1973, will run for eight years from October next year.

Helen Smith pictures 'cast doubt on verdict'

From Our Correspondent
Leeds

New photographs of Helen Smith prove conclusively that she was murdered, it is alleged by the leader of West Yorkshire County Council. He claims that the photographs, taken just after she died in Saudi Arabia four years ago, cast doobt on the evidence at the inquest last December.

Mr John Gunnell, the council leader set op his own investigation yesterday oo her death. He has sent copies of he photographs to the two pathologists who examined Helen Smith's body. He said: "The photographs are of fundamental significance to ascertaining the cause of her death.

"Had they been nvailable at the inquest they would have been the most important exhibits. They would have prevented n good deal of testimony which can now be shnwn to have been based nn inaccurate recollection. More significantly, they wnnld have added measurably to the evidence that her death arose from foul play."

The phntographs were taken by Saudi police. Mr Gunnell said they shnwed the nurse's body in the position in which it was found, making it appear unlikely that she fell

The inquest jury at Leeds returned an npen verdict deciding thnt she had fallen to her death with Jnhannes Otten, n Dutch sea captain.

However, Mr Gunnell said: "The position of the bodies lead to n number of conclusinns which conflict with the inquest evidence.

He has senl the pictures tn Professor Alan Usher and Professor Jorgen Dalgaard. Both pathologists gave evidence at the inquest.

Mr Gunnell added: "I want lo find out from the pathologists if the evidence contained in the pictures alters their opinioo on the cause of death."

PC regrets part in assault case

From a Staff Reporter

Police Constable Timothy Edwards told Birmingham Crown Court yesterday that he felt ashamed for his part in an incident in which a young man was viciousy attacked by a fellow officer for fun.

Bnt PC Edwards said he acted in good faith as a police officer and never kicked or punched the man, who suffered cuts and bruises to his face

PC Edwards, aged 22, of Romilly Close, Suttoo Coldfield, Birmingham, denied assaulting Mr David Campbell, causing him bodily harm. Police Constable David Smallwood, aged 21, formerly at police lodgings in Breedon Road, Stirchley, Birmingham, had admitted assault and will be sentenced after the trial of PC Edwards.

PC Edwards told the court he had drunk 16 pints of mild beer during the day and fell asleep in his car, but he woke up when the driver, PC Smallwood, leapt out to chase someone.

PC Edwards said he tried to block the escape route of Mr Campbell, aged 23, of Fairfax Road, West Heath, Birmingham, but failed.

The trial cootinues today.

Success of vitamins against spina bifida

By David Nicholson-Lord

Government decisioos on the prescription of vitamin diet supplements for pregnant women to prevent them having spina bifida babies are likely to be over taken by pressure from the public, authorities on child health and community medicine said yesterday.

Studies showing that "high risk" women given extra vitamins around the time of cooception have babies free from spina bifida were described as "very exciting" by Professor John Dobbing, of Manchester University's child health department. More and more womeo were likely to demand the treatment from their family doctors, he said.

"There is a lot of dispute, but there is oo dispute whatever that all the findings available are consistent with the proposal tnat vitamins do prevent the defect. The argument is about whether there are alternative explanations that would fit the results", he said

Professor Dobbing was speaking at a conference to launch the publication of a ocw study on vitamio treatment, based on the proceedings of an intensive expert workshop held last autumn.

The study has been published with speed in an attempt to secure a wider public debate on the treatment, shortly to be the subject of a trial by the Medical Research Council.

But several of the medical experts who took part in the workshop yesterday said the trial had been overtaken by events. Professor Ian Leck, of Manchester University's department of community medicine; predicted it would be a "flop" because women at risk would oot accept the possibility of being given placebos rather than vitamins merely to satisfy the requirement of a "double-blind" precedure.

Virtamins are prescribed for a mooth before cooception and the succeeding two months. In one study the pill used provides the vitamins that are regarded in the United States as the recommended daily requirement.

In another study only folic acid, one of the vitamin B complex found in spinach and liver, was administered. A year's supply of this costs £2.60, but the multivitamin cocktail is said to cost 10 times more.

Farmers forced to risk cattle on wet grass

Shortages and high prices of hay and other feeds are forcing some cattle farmers to put their herd out to graze on unfit pastures (Hugh Clayton writes). Farmers faced with steep price increases for hay and other feeds are allowing cattle to graze for short periods on exceptionally wet grass.

The farmers risk severe digestive orders such as bloat in their animals, which may also trample the pastures and postpone still further the time when they will be able to graze in the normal way. Wet grass which has grown fast can lack minerals

Cattle would nsually be grazing at this time of year. However, because of the weather they are being fed on dwindling supplies of feed

Pupils failing at languages

British school-leavers are lagging behind their west European counterparts in foreign language skills, according to a government consultative paper published yetsterday.

Boys in partieular are failing to reach a reasonable level of competence in a foreign language, according to the document published by the Department of Education and science. It says: "I Britain is to trade successfully in the world and play its full part as an effective member of the European community, national competence in foreign languages need to be more like that of other members countries".

Although many more pupils now begin to learn foreign languages, few complete a full course of study. "The picture that emerges is that the attempt to change the emphasis of foreign language teaching have had limited success. Too few school leavers, especially boys, have a reasonable proficiency in a foreign language."

The increase over the last decade in the proportion of pupils taking GCE examinations is very much smaller in foreign languages than in most other subjects. The proportion of school-leavers who have attempted a foreign language A level has fallen, particularly among boys,

Aid planned for doctors in poorer areas

By a Staff Reporter

Family doctor services in the poorer parts of Britain could be greatly improved under proposals being considered by a British Medical Association working groop.

Dr Bryan Davies, chairman of the BMA's general medical services committee in Wales, said yesterday that areas such as the inner cities, South Wales and Durham, which had worse medical facilities, would be affected. "We are talking about great slabs of the country."

Holloway Prison's controversial governor

The cure is in self-improvement

By Peter Evans, Home Affairs Correspondent

Miss Joy Kinsley, aged 50, governor of Holloway Women's Prison, in north London, is behaving in character in her controversial crackdown on professional contacts between her chief education officer, Mr Richard Brown, the Rev James Pink, the chaplain, and former inmates.

She wears sensible shoes and sensible clothes, her grey hair is in short, sensible curls and she likes men to be sensible about women prisoners.

Before I went off to write about Bullwood Hall, the girls' borstal, she warned me not to be taken in by the charm they could put on. She was then working in the prison department's regional office.

Staff at Holloway liken her to an old-style "school marm". Her slightly forbidding manner and composure are said to come from her training as a nurse at St Thomas' Hospital, in south London.

In keeping with the Victorian prisons in which she has worked, she is best summed up by tho titles of Samuel Smiles's books: Self-Help, Character, and Duty, all given edge by a restless search for self-improvement.

She qualified as a midwife and then as a social worker before joining the prison service as an assistant governor at the staff college in Wakefield, West Yorkshire, in 1966.

Her determined single-mindedness helped to make her the first women governor in charge of male prisoners. That was at Pucklechurch Remand Centre, in Bristol, for males and females.

Last June she became the first woman deputy regional director in the south-east. Her rise to be a top governor was the fastest for a decade.

She began her revolution at Holloway, when the prison was already in the turmoil of rebuilding last July and represents new thinking in the Prison Department.

The belief that criminals could be "cured" of crime led to the new Holloway being envisaged as a hospital.

Now, those ideas are out. Dr Megan Bull, a medical officer, became governor. For Miss Kinsley believes women can be bad as well as sad or mad. Work parties were dispatched to give the prison a thorough clean-up. There is a morning parade where there is not a stiletto heel in sight.

She has 10 years to go before retirement and governor colleagues think she may become the first woman regional director in the service. Her private life remains just that, devoted to looking after her cats and her aged mother.

ELECTION JUNE 83 Tories to tackle unions ● Owen on coalitions ● Wilson on winning

Tebbit promises three changes in the law to curb union power

By Paul Routledge, Labour Editor

Mr Norman Tebbit, the Secretary of State for Employment, confirmed the Government's intention yesterday to legislate in three areas of trade union activity if returned to power.

In an interview with The Times he disclosed that new laws governing the election of trade union leaders, pre-strike ballots and the political activity of unions would be a central part of the Conservative election strategy.

Mr Tebbit said that he believed many of the unemployed would vote Conservative because "people frankly do not believe" Labour's claim of being able to find 2,500,000 jobs in five years.

The Employment Secretary believes that further curbs on the unions will be a vote-winner, particularly among union members. He has decided to legislate on all three areas of union law and practice examined in his recent Green Paper, Democracy in Trade Unions.

These are: compulsory secret ballots for the election of governing bodies of trade unions; measures to encourage unions to hold a secret ballot before embarking on strike action; and a tighter rein on the political activities of unions.

"The 1980 and 1982 employment Acts are very popular and well supported by trade unionsts", he argued, "although opposed by trade union leaders. And the proposals that will flow from the Green Paper are obviously going to be very popular with trade unionists as well. The polls show that we have increased our support among trade unionsts."

Speaking on the eve of publication of the Conservative manifesto, Mr Tebbit said he was confident of having found a way to ensure that workers were permitted to vote on strike action much more often than at present.

"Trade union members do seem to be interested in who their leaders are", he said. "Given the chance to take part in free and fair ballots, far more of them vote than when it is one of the traditional methods of election, in late-night meetings, at inconvenient times and places."

The railwaymen were pushed into a strike without a ballot, he said. "The water workers never had an opportunity to ballot at any stage, as far as I know. Were any of them actually asked to mark on a ballot paper: 'Do you want to strike or not?' There is a very real interest in what we can do to encourage people to have strike ballots."

Mr Tebbit has been tipped for promotion within the Cabinet if the Government retains office, possibly to Home Secretary, but he said he would be "perfectly happy" to remain Employment Secretary if Mrs Thatcher so wished. "There is still a lot of work to do."

On the likelihood of a Conservative victory at the polls, he said: "Like most of my colleagues, I am reasonably confident that, provided we continue to carry our message across to the electorate, we shall be returned to government".

Labour's manifesto he regards as a gift to the Government. "We have the advantage that the remedies offered by the Labour Party are known to have been tried before, and to have failed. They are seen not to be used by any of our leading competitors abroad.

"By making these wild claims that, merely by spending money we have not got, you can bring unemployment down to less than one million in five years, the Labour Party is scoring an own goal because people frankly do not believe it."

Labour believed that the problem of unemployment was one confined to Great Britain, and had been caused entirely by the Government. They believed it could be cured by spending.

In the general election 42,703,019 people will be eligible to vote in the United Kingdom, compared with 41,096,751 in May, 1979, according to electoral statistics published by the Government Statistical Service.

The increase of the number of electors in the four countries of the UK is: England, from 34,212,573 to 35,569,230; Scotland, from 3,795,865 to 3,934,220; Wales, from 2,061,109 to 2,138,384; and Northern Ireland, from 1,027,204 to 1,061,185.

In 1979, 76 per cent of the electors voted, a total of 31,221,364. In each country the turnouts were: England, 75.9 per cent; Scotland, 76.8 per cent; Wales, 79.4 per cent; and Northern Ireland, 67.7 per cent.

The number of constituencies in England is now increased by seven to 523, in Northern Ireland by five to 17, in Scotland by one to 72, and in Wales by two to 38:–The UK total is now 650 seats.

Noting the increase in the electorate, the Statistical Service states: "This is due to the new electors exceeding the number of deletions due to death and emigration; the effect of the high level of births in the mid-1960s is still strong.

"The level of registration of Attainers [formerly called the Y voters] in England and Wales remained high, at approximately 80 per cent."

There are now 739,854 Attainers – that is boys and girls who became or will became aged 18 between February 17, 1983, and February 15, 1984 – on the register, and 270,180 service voters, compared with 245,854 on the 1982 register.

Constituencies with the largest and smallest electorates are given below. The range of the electorates, following the redrawing of parliamentary boundaries, is now much smaller; from 95,000 to 23,000, compared with a variation from 132,000 to 17,000 in the previous constituencies.

To be eligible to vote, an adult resident in the United Kingdom must be a citizen of the United Kingdom and Colonies, or of a Commonwealth country or of the Republic of Ireland. An analysis of the 1981 Register showed that of the eligible people who were born in the United Kingdom, Ireland or the Old Commonwealth, 6 per cent were not registered.

For those who had been naturalized, or have registered as citizens of the United Kingdom and Colonies, the proportion not registered was 12 per cent. This contrasted with the much higher rate of non-registration of 31 per cent citizens of the New Commonwealth countries.

Advertising salvo from Tories

By Our Political Staff

The Conservative Party's first advertising salvo, published in national newspapers today, is in the form of a last will and testament, indicating what a person voting Labour will be committed to.

It includes declarations such as "I agree to have the value of my savings reduced immediately in accordance with Labour's wishes to devalue the pound".

Others include: "I hereby give up the right to choose which school my children go to and agree to abide by any decision made by the state on my behalf", and, "I sign away the right to buy my council house".

Paisley seeks a poll pact

The Rev Ian Paisley, leader of the Democratic Unionist Party (DUP) in Northern Ireland is trying to negotiate an electoral pact with Mr James Molyneaux, leader of the Official Unionists, to avoid splitting the Unionist vote in six constituencies where divided loyalties might ensure victory for either Sinn Fein or the Social Democratic and Labour Party.

The DUP wants a free run, for example, in Belfast West where Mr Gerald Fitt faces a challenge for the Catholic vote from Mr Gerry Adams, vice-president of Sinn Fein.

Euro MP chosen

Mr Robert Jackson, Conservative European MP for Upper Thames, will fight the general election in the new Wantage constituency in Oxfordshire.

The choice of Mr Jackson, aged 36, as the Conservative candidate came after Mr Tom Benyon, the former MP for Abingdon, said he would not seek the nomination for personal and business reasons.

The master's guide to the art of winning elections

By David Hewson

"It's a lot easier fighting a General Election as Prime Minister", Sir Harold Wilson says. "You speak with more authority." Then he promptly describes how he twice achieved power as Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition.

Still with an impish humour and pointed turn of phrase, Sir Harold at 67 is standing down after 38 years in the House with a record unchallenged in modern times: four General Election victories (1964, 1966 and two in 1974), and one defeat (1970).

"I was very lucky that my first fight (in 1964) was at the end of 13 years of Conservative rule", he adds. "It meant we had something fresh and new to offer, though I was wrong in my reaction when the Conservatives elected Alec Home after my old sparring partner Harold Macmillan. We made a lot about the 19th earl or the 13th earl or whatever he was, but, by heaven, he ran it very close.

Then there was 1974, when he again climbed to power from the Opposition benches, during the miners' strike against Mr Edward Heath's pay curbs.

"I tried to get Ted off the book over that because I didn't want to have an election during a strike: 1974 was an extraordinary election in every way – the only one, I think, outside wartime which has been fought under a state of national emergency.

"I was able to turn the coal strike to our advantage. Remember, at that time it was illegal for any industrial firm to work more than three days a week. So it was an easy one for me because of my background. The result of the second 1974 election was less good than I had hoped, and indeed that is what later left Jim Callaghan in a spot because the majority was so small."

Sir Harold thought Mrs Margaret Thatcher ran a good campaign to defeat Mr Callaghan in 1979. "Jim got the timing wrong but I can't blame him for that because he consulted me the previous September and I said he didn't have to go. Unfortunately, I don't think anyone could have foreseen the dirty streets we ended up with" (in the "winter of discontent").

Although there may be political theorists who believe it is easier for an Opposition to overthrow a Government than for a party to return for a second term, Sir Harold firmly believes the advantage lies with Downing Street.

"Some in the Labour Party would prefer us always to be in opposition; but the people who seal the envelopes and do the canvassing are as loyal as they can be, and it's a thrill to them to have, as it were, their own prime minister."

Sir Harold feels his campaigning style changed little over the years.

"You have a few good tips at the back of your mind for dealing with any new proposals the Opposition make: will they work? what will they cost? And the Civil Service machine quietens down to prepare the Queen's Speech for the Leader of the Opposition, should he win."

In office, Sir Harold drafted his own key statements, which were inserted into speeches produced by election staff and released as press handouts the following day. They were usually about the government's record.

"The handout was what I hoped the press would pick up and they usually did. Sometimes I might reply to a charge from the opposition if it needed handling, but as in all walks of life, on balance you don't advertise your opponent."

It is a little too early to judge Mrs Thatcher's present campaigning, although Sir Harold feels she may be in danger of over exposure. "There's a little too much talking going on.

She was wise, he feels, to decide to go to the Williamsburg conference just 10 days before the election.

"She's got a favourable press on the whole, which helps. I can imagine what one or two papers would have said if I'd gone to Williamsburg. They would have stated my motives rather differently from the way they'll state hers.

As for the Labour Party: "It hasn't helped itself. It's easy for the hostile press but those on the other side have been given something to talk about. Mrs Thatcher's image is that of the toughest man we've got. She's certainly the toughest man on her side; but we've got Healey. The Labour Party will go into it with a lot of determination but perhaps feeling that she has pulled a fast one on the timing."

And if any voter thought that politicians actually like elections, Sir Harold is happy to disabuse them. "I never enjoyed them, whether I was Leader of the Opposition or Prime Minister. . . . They're such hard work."

Owen outlines the 'good policies' of Labour and Tories

By Our Political Staff

Never short of an answer, Dr David Owen, the former Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, who was fielded as the Liberal/SDP Alliance spokesman at yesterday's London press conference, outlined the "good things" in the Labour and Conservative Party programmes which might encourage the Alliance MPs in a "hung" parliament to support them in office.

In reply to Mr Walter Cronkite, the American television commentator, Dr Owen had listed items which the Aliance opposed. Then he was asked to take a positive approach.

Dr Owen said: "Well, the Labour Party's heart is in the right place on unemployment, though I think some of their proposals for curing it would actually increase unemployment". Labour's heart was also sound on poverty, though again he thought their proposals were not as radical and redistributive as those of the Alliance.

He thought their heart was in the demand for more and better housing, "but they fail to face up to the fact that there are thousands if not millions of house tenants who want to purcase their houses."

The Alliance scheme, providing a pound for every pound saved by the tenant, would give many more people the chance to but their home.

The Alliance manifesto states that the present capital home loan scheme to help first-time buyers is "a paltry thing", adding at most £110 capital for the £1,000 saved by the buyer.

The Alliance wants to extend the scheme so that anyone saving £1,000 over two years will receive an extra £1,000. Rents paid over more than five years by council house tenants would count as the equivalent of £1,000 and would also qualify for the additional £1,000.

As for the Conservatives, they were sensible in their support for the mixed economy, for a thriving private sector, on the need to help small businesses and their recognition that firms had to be profitable to invest and become competitive.

Conservatives could also be applauded for understanding the merits and benefits of continued membership of the European Economic Community.

Mr David Penhaligon, former Liberal MP for Truro, sharing the platform with Dr Owen, said that possibly the greatest quality of the Alliance from the elector's point of view was that it would act as a moderating influence in Parliament to block extreme policies put forward by the other parties.

When it was pointed out to Dr Owen that he had not mentioned the introduction of proportional representation as a condition of support for any party wooing them he quickly put the record straight. "That is the essential prerequisite for the effective government of this country.

Dr David Owen: a refreshing approach to moderation.

Buoyant Labour hopes for gains in Scotland

By Ian Bradley

Scotland looks as though it will conform much more closely to the overall United Kingdom trend in this campaign than in the last four general elections. Although Labour still has a lead in opinion polls north of the border, it was down to 3 per cent in the last Scotsman poll.

Even more significant, the devolution issue, which dominated Scottish politics in the 1970s, has largely subsided and the campaign is likely to centre on the same themes as in England.

Labour starts from a commanding position holding most of the Scottish seats at the dissolution. It will campaign vigorously on unemployment and especially on the importance of retaining steel, shipbuilding and coal industries in Scotland.

The party has high hopes of taking two seats from the Tories: Cunningham, north, the seat of Mr John Corrie, the anti-abortion campaigner, and Aberdeen, South, the former seat of Mr Iain Sproat, who has gone to a new constituency in the borders.

Labour also hopes to take Dundee, East from the Scottish Nationalist Party and displace the three SDP MPs in Scotland: Mr Roy Jenkins, at Glasgow, Hillhead; Mr Robert MacLennan, Caithness and Motherland and Dr Dickson Mabon, Renfew, West and Inverclyde.

The Conservatives, who will argue that Scotland has done relatively well in the recession, are also in buoyant mood. They have hopes of gaining Glasgow, Cathcart; Stirling; Dunbarton, and they also have their eyes on Leith, the seat formerly held by Mr Ron Brown, the Labour left-winger.

The SDP Liberal Alliance could be in trouble. The SDP's three seats in Scotland are all vulnerable to Labour and the Liberals seem likely to lose Orkney and Shetland after the retirement of Mr Jo Grimond.

But they have hopes of capturing the new seat of Roxburgh and Berwickshire, which adjoins Mr David Steel's constituency, and the new seat of Fife, North-east. However, Mr Russell Johnston, the Scottish Liberal Party leader, looks vulnerable to the Conservatives, in Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber, having lost the Island of Skye in boundary changes.

The Scottish Nationalists go into the election weakened by a low rating in the polls and a long period of bitter internal squabbling. Mr Gordon Wilson, the party chairman, is in serious danger of losing Dundee, East, although the other MP in the last Parliament, Mr Donald Stewart, looks safe in the Western Isles.

The Nationalist's biggest hope is in Orkney and Shetland, where their candidate is Mrs Winifred Ewing, the Euro MP for the Scottish Highlands and Islands. It seems unlikely, however, that the SNP will be able to win back the nine seats which it lost in the 1979 election.

A hard task faces the Social Democrats in Stockton North and South, their two most crucial northern seats. There was no encouragement for them in the recent local elections, the national polls are equally depressing and the memory of the Darlington by-election still casts a shadow across the prospects of Mr William Rodgers and Mr Ian Wrigglesworth.

The local Labour establishment is determined that the two sitting members shall learn the error of their ways in leaving the party for the SDP, while the Tories see a split Labour vote as giving them a strong chance.

Boundary changes introduce another precarious factor, for the SDP in what has been for many years Labour-held territory. SDP workers calculate that the new boundary lines broadly change the old balance from an urban to a suburban or rural vote in important places, giving the Conservatives a stronger chance, particularly in Stockton South.

Mr Rodgers is left with a large spread of Labour-voting housing estates to woo across to the SDP view, and Mr Wrigglesworth has inherited a stretch of countryside where his strong personal appeal is untested. They know that in the present climate it will be their personal records that allow them to remain in power.

Mr Wrigglesworth was one of the few Labour MPs returned at the last general election with an increased majority. Had the regional swing gone against him he would have lost to the Conservatives, from whom he won the Thornaby constituency in 1974. He had 51 per cent of the vote last time and a majority of 5,524. His main competitor is Mr Tom Finnegan, aged 44, a Yorkshire company director who is new to national politics. The Labour nomination, Mr Frank Griffiths, a lecturer at Teesside Polytechnic, seems to show more interest in being selected for Middlesborough rather than a new seat that will probably require a swing of 1966 proportions for Labour to win with a new candidate.

Mr Rodgers is the longest serving MP for Stockton. He has held the seat for 21 years and won high Labour government office. At the recent local elections in Stockton North, Conservative and Labour were narrowly matched. The SDP fought only five of the 17 wards but on a projection would have won about two-thirds of the vote recorded by the other parties. Perhaps the saving factor for them is that 32,000 Stockton people who did not vote then may be expected to turn out at a general election.

The battle for Mr Rodgers is to win half those votes to have any chance of holding the seat. A tall order, but like Mr Wrigglesworth he has a strong personal following.

His Labour opponent is Mr Frank Cook, a construction project manager with a local company and a trade union official. He was already prepared to challenge Mr Rodgers's nomination before the SDP defection, and there seemed little love lost between the men.

Mr Cook complained that Mr Rodgers had lambasted him for being militant during his time as Labour MP. "My attitude will be to fight this election on a programme of policies. Personalities will not come into it, but if he chooses to dish a bit of dirt . . ."

The Conservatives challenge to Mr Rodgers is led by Mr Harry Davies, a prominent local politician. Unemployment is the main weapon that will inevitably be aimed against him, but he is encouraged by the local election results and remains confident that a split Labour vote and the newly shaped boundaries will win him the seat.

Something of a Tory fundamentalist and headmaster of a Stockton primary school he says his issues would be the "three Rs": retention of common market membership; Russia and a policy that does not leave Britain defenceless against communism; recession and the Government's action in handling the economic consequences.

Dr David Owen, who clung to Plymouth, Devonport, for Labour in 1979 faces a formidable task to hold the seat under the Alliance banner which, opinion polls suggest, is looking pretty tattered in the naval dockyard city.

Apparently well back in third place behind the two other parties, Dr Owen was unusually subdued at his first press conference in the city where Labour believes he is about to be punished for his defection to the SDP and disinclination to fight a by-election.

Dr Owen conceded that he faced a tough, uphill struggle and said: "My problem is that the extent of what has happened to the Labour Party nationally has never been mirrored in Plymouth. It is no good trying to pretend it has been infiltrated by Militants or the hard left. It is not the case at all."

Dr Owen's obvious predicament, however, does not mean a clear run for Labour. Its moderate and well-liked candidate, Julian Priestly, faces a strong challenge from the Conservatives' Miss Ann Widdecombe, especially if the Labour vote is split. That is in spite of boundary changes that have drawn in apparently strong Labour areas from the neighbouring Tory-held Drake constituency.

Local election results in the new Devonport constituency gave Labour 43 per cent, the Conservatives 33 per cent and the SDP–Liberal Alliance 24 per cent. This week, however, a poll commissioned by South-west Television put the Conservatives ahead with 38 per cent, Labour 29.5 per cent and the Alliance trailing badly with only 16.5 per cent. Don't knows were 16 per cent.

The contest could be decided by the issue of the Devonport Naval dockyard which employs about 13,000 people and how it might be affected by Labour's defence plans.

Miss Widdecombe, aged 35, a senior administrator at London University, describes herself as a Tory dry "with some damp patches" and is clearly intent on a high profile campaign. She has seized on the dockyard issue claiming that remarks by a Labour defence spokesman have thrown doubt on the transfer of work to Devonport from dockyards at Chatham and Portsmouth.

Mr Priestley and his officials regard the Tory campaign over the dockyard as being cheap, pointing out that a Labour government extended its work to include a submarine refitting base and a frigate complex and that it was the Conservatives who cut the size of the Navy.

The Labour candidate said the dockyard's future was assured, but there are early signs that the party knows that it has a hot issue on its hands.

Mr Priestley, aged 32, an administrator with the European Parliament, believes, however, that the Conservatives will maintain a high vote in Devonport, even though the constituency should support a Labour majority of six or seven thousand "in normal circumstances".

He will fight hard on unemployment, which is 17 per cent in Plymouth, but his support of the party's unilateralist nuclear stand could make him vulnerable in an area dominated by the presence of the dockyard.

1979 General election: D A L Owen (Lab) 18,848; K Hughes (C) 16,644; N Jones (L) 2,360; L Beaufort-Walker (NF) 243; R Stoner (Ind) 203. Lab majority 1,001.

Thatcher cautions Tory troops to expect rough with the smooth

By Philip Webster, Political Reporter

Mrs Margaret Thatcher alerted Conservative Party workers to the danger of overconfidence yesterday, telling them to expect a rough passage at some time during the election campaign and to stay calm when it came.

The fear among senior Conservatives that their strong lead in the polls may encourage some voters to flirt with the Alliance was evident in the cautious warning that the Prime Minister, in o buoyant form, gave to the staff at Tory Central Office.

Workers assembled in the newly refurbished conference room were told by Mrs Thatcher: "I hardly need stress to you how critical these next three weeks are. They will shape the whole of our future from June 9 oowards."

She continued: "You will read the opinion polls. So do I. Having fought together – we are quite a seasoned army – we know that somewhere in the middle of the campaign there will be a very rough passage. That is the point of time where we all have to stay absolotely calm and absolutely together, to get the answers out and go on putting our policies to the people."

Mrs Thatcher said that she was cautiously optimistic; that was the right way to approach the election. "We believe passionately in our policies. We believe passionately that they are right for Britain. We shall work to see that we are returned on June 9 so that we will have the second of what I hope will prove to be more than two terms."

She said the party had a doty both to put forward its own positive policies and to show how disastous the Labour manifesto, if implemented, would be for Britain. She had read it twice, she said, and had come to realize how extreme it was and how far it departed from everything previous Labour leaders and governments had done.

Mrs Thatcher's election tour, which begins on Friday, will not be as heavily concentrated on the marginal seats as in 1979, when she visited 39 of the 81 constituencies on the so called "critical list".

She told her planners of her desire to visit strong Tory areas. As a result, her heavy schedule will be divided almost equally between the marginals and the heartlands.

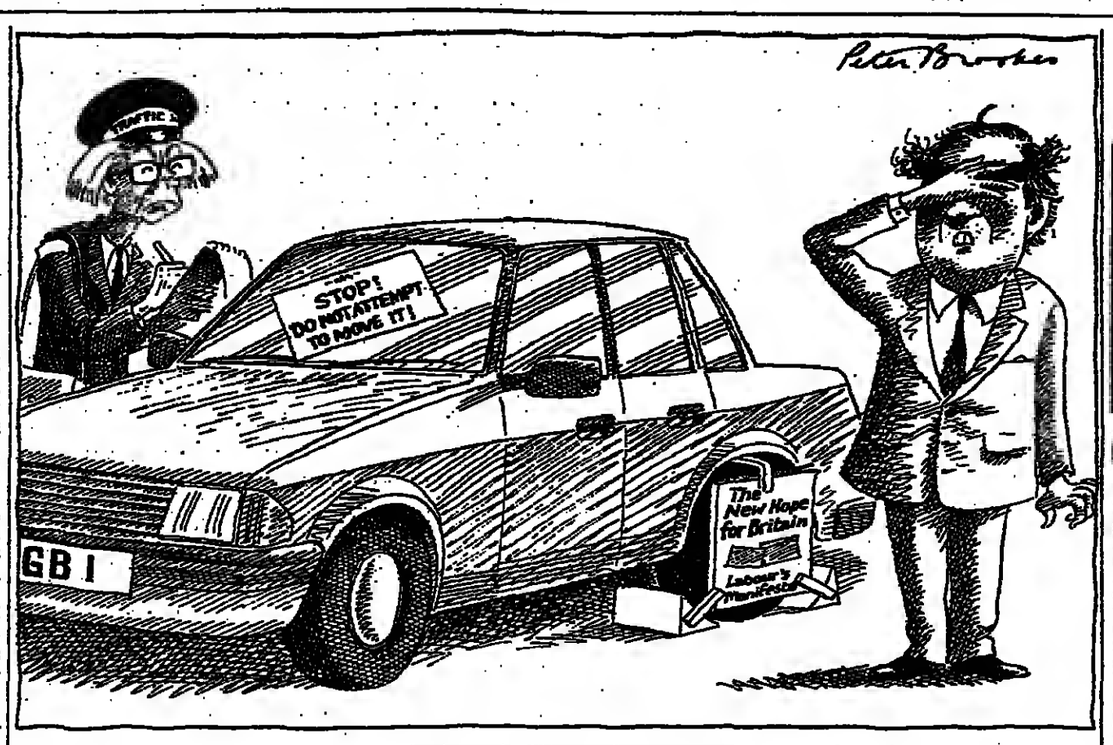
For security reasons, detailed plans for her tour are not being given, but it is know that she will be travelling to most parts of the country, speaking two days in the West Country and Wales and single days in East Anglia, Scotland, the East Midland, West Midlands, the South East and North West, as well as campaigning in her Finchley constituency in London. The tour will be broken by her trip to the Williamsburg summit io the United States.

Mrs Thatcher, who will accompanied by her husband and daughter, is expected to make about half dozen keynote speeches during the tour, and another at her adoption meeting in Finchley tomorrow night.

She will be travelling by air, coach, car and helicopter. A BAC 1-11 has been chartered by the party for some £60,000 from British Island Airways. A press party of about 50 will accompany her.

● Mr Cecil Parkinson, chairman of the Conservative Party, said in an broadcast yesterday: "Four years ago this Government accepted a task that appeared almost impossible. Our country had been slowly declining for years. To reverse this decline was not something that could be accomplished easily. It required courage and perserverance.

"But we are oow beginning to see the first fruits. British industry is confirming that the recovery is underway.



Mr David Marquand (above), a former Labour MP and minister and now a university professor, has been adopted as the Alliance candidate for the High Peak of Derbyshire. He was adopted at a joint meeting of local Liberal and SDP members.

Alliance Welsh plan launched

The SDP/Liberal Alliance claimed yesterday that it could win between 12 and 15 of Wales's 38 seats. Launching its programme for Wales, the Alliance emphasized its first priority would be to reduce unemployment with plans to create 60,000 jobs over the next two years.

Party leaders discounted claims that the Alliance was trailing fourth behind Plaid Cymru after poor results in the local elections, and said its first task was to provide hope, training and employment, particularly for the young.

Sever's fight

Mr John Sever the Labour moderate who was ousted from his Birmingham, Ladywood, constituency by left wingers, is to fight Meridan in Warwickshire for the party. He was chosen from a short list of five to contest the seat won by Conservatives in 1979 with a majority of 4,127.

Mr George McKinlay, aged 24, a BL shopsteward at the strike-bound Albioo plant in Glasgow, has been named as a candidate for the Workers' Revolutionary Party to fight the Greenock and Port Glasgow seat.

Brian McDermott, an actor, who is standing as an independent candidate for the Isle of Wight, has discovered that his wife, Joanna, will be canvassing against him for the Conservatives.

SDP 'day before yesterday's men'

By Anthony Bevins, Political Correspondent

The Conservative Party yesterday issued a scathing attack on the Social Democrats, describing their leaders as "the day-before-yesterday's-men".

A briefing handbook for party candidates, Politics Today, said: "The Liberal-SDP Alliance is formed from two indifferent sorts of political party. The Liberals can draw on a long history and a radical tradition. The Social Democratic Party has oo history and oo tradition: it is a product of the internal struggles of the Labour Party."

The booklet, produced by the Conservative Research Department, commented on SDP membership: "In the country at large, the SDP has attracted malcontents from the Labour Party, particularly those dispossessed by left-wing constituency cliques".

It added: "The leadership of the SDP may be described as the day-before-yesterday's men. They see themselves as the heirs of Attlee."

On the Liberals, it said: "From its inception, the Liberal Party has been an uneasy coalition composed of many differing factions and interest groups. Old-fashioned Whigs, descendants of so-called religious non-conformity and exponants of laissez faire, find themselves allied to 'community politicians' and 'politicians of protest'.

"Bot the party must now be seen as having a place on the left of the political spectrum, as the Lib-Lab pact of 1977-78 showed."

The booklet said that the alliance with the SDP had not been marked by fraternal goodwill; there had been disagreements between tho leaders of the two parties and activists had been even more hostile to one another.

"The lack of that 'true spirit of partnership' for which the Alliance is supposed to stand has nowhere been more evident than in the squabbles which have occurred over the division of cootituencies", the Tory researchers said. A legacy of bitterness had also been left by the differences over Alliance leadership.

As for policy, the booklet said that the Liberal approach was somewhat haphazard. It was often difficult to identify the party's position oo a given issue.

"Moreover, in so far as it is possible to identify joint policies, they are generally those of yester-year.

● Mrs Thatcher should anoounce at the Williamsburg summit that Britain would be willing to pot its nuclear missiles into the Geneva disarmament negotiations, Mr David Steel, joint leader of the SDP–Liberal Alliance, said in Scotland last night (Michael Knipe writes from Galshiels).

The Prime Minister should go to the summit determined to use all Britain's authority to secure real international ecomomie expansioo and disarmament.

● Victory for Mrs Thatcher would leave Britain with the most right-wing government in the Western world, Mr Roy Jenkins, Prime Minister designate of the Alliance, said in Stockton-on-Tees yesterday (the Press Association reports).

Labour's magic 'a myth'

No party except the Communists had ever published "such a wholesale attack" on British business and management, Mr Norman Tebbit, Secretary of State for Employment, said yesterday.

Mr Tebbit said that Labour's "magic" was really a myth: spending money to create jobs had been tried by the Callaghan government, and it had failed.

Speaking to officers of Chingford Conservative Association in his Essex constituency, Mr Tebbit said the Labour leader would reinvigorate the economy, win more exports, gain new customers with better service and lower prices "by nationalizing anything he fancies."

Labour would put the unions back on top of management. They want "Red Robbo and his mates" in charge of BL, Mr Tebbit said.

"We all know Labour's magic, painless, foolproof, easy answer to beat the problem of unemployment. I am just surprised that with over 12 million unemployed in the EEC and over 30 million in the major fee world nations, no one except Mr Foot and Mr Benn has tumbled to the easy answer, the certain cure, for the world's major problem."

● The Government's view of senior management and trade union opinion on its industrial relations policies was sharply challenged yesterday by Eric Parsloe Industrial Communications, an influential consultancy. It reported that a poll of senior managers showed a big majority against legal intervention in issues such as the closed shop and picketing (our Labour Editor writes).

The survey of 507 senior managers and leading trade unionists was conducted as the election was being announced. Mr Paraloe said the results suggested that the campaign to show that managers were blindly supporting the Conservatives and that trade unionists can all be sterotyped was not supported by impartial evidence.

Healey upholds team spirit

From John Winder
West Bromwich

The difference between the Conservative and Labour parties was the difference between a one-woman band and a team, Mr Denis Healey, Deputy leader of the Labour Party, said at an election meeting in West Bromwich in the West Midlands yesterday.

"She does not seem to have the slightest confidence in her colleagues", he declared. Mrs Thatcher did not trust any of them to behave while she was away. She had claimed there was no need for a consensus in her Cabinet. She said ooe word and her colleagues went down on their knees.

She had already told the press through public relations officers that if she won power again poor old Willie Whitelaw and Francis Pym would go to the knacker's yard. Mr James Prior might have a stay of execution because she had already sent him to a power station in Mongolia – or was it Northern Ireland?

"It is dangerous to put the destiny of a party or a country in the hands of a single person, even one more sensitive and less pig-headed than the Prime Minister", he said.

The difference between the Tories and Labour was that Labour was a team with Michael Foot, Roy Hattersley, Eric Varley and Mr Healey – all household names. They were fighting as a team and when they had won the election would run te country as a team.

"Yon cannot do anything worthwhile in a democratic country unless government and people are working shoulder to shoulder."

The Conservative election manifesto would be published tomorrow. It was a forgery. This weekend there might be a leading article in The Sunday Times by that great historian, Lord Dacre, explaining that when he first read it he thought it was genuine but now realized that it was a forgery because it said just the same things as the last Tory manifesto which they Knew was a forgery. In that Mrs Thatcher had said they would create real jobs in Britain but they had trebled unemployment and no one knew that better than people in the West Midlands.

"We need seats in the West Midlands because we cannot win a majority without them. We need a majority oext time. We do oot want another minority government dependent upoo a Liberal rabble without a leader with every vote that passes."

Mrs Thatcher's real crime against the country was that she had set out deliberately when she took office to destroy the self-confidence in the British people, to turn them into a uniform mass of sullen sub-men meekly acquiescent in everything the Government said

Energy policy to boost jobs

Thousands of jobs for semi-skilled and unskilled workers will be created if Labour comes to power through the party's energy conservation programme, Mr John Smith, the party's energy spokesman, claimed yesterday (Our Political Staff write).

Speaking at the party's London press conference, he said: "The aim would be to insulate most of Britain's housing, starting with a large public sector programme for council houses. People will be recruited from the dole queues instead of being paid to do nothing.

Census clues to voting intentions

By Our Political Editor

A mass of detailed information about differnt social and economic characteristics of every parliamentary constituency in Great Britain, compiled from the census, is published today by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.

As well as detailed statistics about the population, including familiar classifications by age, occupation, birth and housing tenure, new material includes analysis of how voters travel to work, their higher educational qualifications and other characteristics not previously shown in census monitors.

The tables are full of interest for those searching for votes. They show for example that Brent, South, in north London, has the highest proportion of black and Asian households, that is those in which the head was born in the oew Commoowealth or Pakistan. They constitute 45.7 per cent of all households.

Easington, co Durham, has the smallest proportion, 0.2 per cent. Penrith, the seat of Mr William Whitelaw, the Homw Secretary, has only marginally more, with 0.3 per cent.

Most black and Asian voters have in the past been strong supporters of the Labour Party.

Net population changes in the 10 years to 1981 brought the greatest proportional increase to Milton Keynes (87.26 per cent), and the biggest loss to Glasgow, Central (40 per cent).

The proportion of electors in the professional and managerial groups is described by Mr Robert Waller in his Almanac of British Politics as the "best predictor of the Labour and Conservative shares of the vote – the higher the percentage, the more Conservative a seat is likely to be".

The census monitors show that the highest proportion of professional and managerial households, those whose heads are in the Registrar-General's socio-economic groops 1, 2, 3, 4 and 13, are in Esher, in the Surrey stockbroker belt (46 per cent). The lowest proportions are all in the old city ceotres with Glasgow Provan (2.4 per cent) at the bottom.

The figures for housing tenure, another widely used indicator of voting behaviour, shows that Castle Point, in Essex, has the highest proportioo of owner-occupiers (84 per cent) and Southwark and Bermondsey the lowest, at 2.4 per cent of households.

Peace is declared in Brent

By Rupert Morris

The hatchet will formally be buried this evening in the feud between Labour's national executive and the party in Brent East, in London, which has been trying to replace Mr Reginald Freeson with Mr Kenneth Livingstone, leader of the Greater London Council.

Members of the local party were persuaded yesterday to abandon their attempt to hold a reselection meeting. Their legal adviser, Lord Gifford, said they were on doubtful ground in challenging the party executive on its interpretation of the rules.

The may also have been persuaded by letters sent to their homes by Mr James Mortimer, general secretary of the Labour Party.

Mr Mortimer pointed out the clause in the constitnency rules which stipulates that when reselection has not been completed and a general election is called, the sitting MP becomes the automatic candidate.

He added: "May I now urge you, in the interests of the Labour Party, to give your support to the Labour candidate, Reg Freeson? He has been a good and energetic Labour MP, and his return is essential to contribute to the election of o Labour government committed to the manifesto of the party."

The letter shows the depth of concern among party leaders obout the potential damage the local party might have done, possibly forcing its disbandment, by continuing its defiance.

Mr Mortimer ended with an appeal for help in Mr Freeson's campaign, and gave the telephone number of his agent, Mr John Ryan. Yesterday Mr Ryan's telephone was ringing constantly with offers of support.

Mr Colin Adams, chairman of the Brent East party was unwilling to make any public statement until after this evening's meeting of the general committee, first called as a reselection conference, now expected to call off the attempt.

Mr Adams was given a rough reception on Monday night by his branch, which made it clear that it had no interest in nominating a candidate, and was scathing about the general committee's decision last week to press ahead in defiance of the national executive. Branches in Brent East have received many messages from other branches, many of strong left-wing convictions, urging them to call off the dispute in the interest of fighting the election.

Alliance can soften Tory policies, Rodgers says

BROADCASTING

The SDP-Liberal Alliance could provide the only effective way to soften and modify some of the dangerous tendencies of a re-elected Conservative government, Mr William Rodgers of the SDP said on the BBC's Election Call yesterday.

Asked obont the possible voters' fear of a "hung" Priiament if they voted for the Alliance, Mr Rodgers said: "The Labour Party has not got a foture. It has been suffering a terminal decline and the real question is whether one day you would like to see an SDP-Liberal Alliance government, next time or soon afterwards, and whether you would like an effective opposition to a Conservative government led by Mrs Thatcher or led by anybody else."

He urged people to vote according to their convictions and conscience and not to make calculations about how that would effect the old political parties.

"We are fighting to form the next government of Britain but were that not to happen the country desperately needs an effective Opposition and that is what we could provide."

● There had undoubtedly been a change in the conduct of economic policy by the Government, Mr Edward Heath, the former Conservative Prime Minister, said in an interview on Radio 4's The World at One.

It had started with the simple monetarist idea that all you had to do was to fix the money supply and everything else was going to follow, he said. "Now we find that the Bank of England from time to time is intervening as far as the rate of sterling is concerned and undoubtedly also the attitude towards interest ates has changed."

He said that if Mrs Thatcher decided to go to the Williamsburg summit she would be right.

● The reaction of the press to Labour's manifesto was predictable, Mr Peter Shore, Labour's chief spokesman oo Treasury and economic affairs, said yesterday.

Speaking on The World At One he said he wanted "an honest, realistic and competetive" pound and not one that was artificial and dishonest, propped up by damagingly high interest rates.

Asked about the forthcoming Conservative advertising campaign poster inviting people to vote away 14 rights by voting Labour, Mr Shore said the public could expect the most grotesque, yet subtle distortions from Saatchi and Saatchi.

● Mr Denis Healey, deputy leader of the Labour Party, accused the Conservatives of setting out "deliberately to destroy the self confidence of our people". World experts said that another Conservative term of office would result in a further half million unemployed.

"Britain, under Mrs Thatcher, is on a journey to the graveyard, and with Mr Tebbitt driving the hearse we will be there that bit faster".

The drift to nuclear war continued. Both sides already had enough atomic weapns to destroy the world ten times over but missile continued to be piled upon missile. Mrs Thatcher said there was no alternative and no hope.

Geoffrey Smith

COMMENT

Is the principal purpose of a general election to choose a Prime Minister or a government? Both Labour and the Alliance are putting the emphasis on the team at the top. At their first press conference nn Monday Labour fielded Mr Foot, Mr Healey and Mr Shore, with Mr Healey and Mr Shore taking their full share of the questions. Yesterday, whilo Mr Foot was in Lancashire, Mr Healey, Mr Shore and Mr John Smith were on parade, together with Mr Sam McCluskie as chairman of the party.

The Alliance has also been ringing the changes at its conferences. On Monday it was Mr Steel and Mr Jenkins. Yesterday it had Dr Owen and Mr Penhaligon. This morning it will be Mr Steel and Mr Rodgers. On oo occasion this week will the entire team be fielded.

In principle it must be right to put forward a collective leadership. Although the power of the Prime Minister had been increasing, and although Mrs Thatcher has become o particularly dominant Prime Minister, we do not yet have presidential government in this country. Tho electorate senses this and has shown in 1945, 1970 and 1979 that it is not prepared to give office to a party simply because it had the most popular leader.

Making a virtue out of weakness

One of the ways the Conservatives might trip themselves up in this campaign would be by relying too heavily and too obviously upon Mrs Thatcher's personal appeal. The hesitation over whether to attend the Williamsburg summit gave the impression that she doobted if the party could get by without her even for a couple of days. She intends to take the chair herself at most of the morning press conferences, flanked by the chairman of the party and at least one other senior minister. Perhaps she will oftea refrain from taking the leading part oo these occasions, but one would not want to bet on that.

Yet while the approach of Labour and the Alliance is preferable in principle, it is one which they have both adopted from necessity. They have stumbled into making a virtue of their own weakness.

Labour is pushing forward the rest of the team because it has saddled itself with the least impressive leader in the eyes of the electorate. There was that remarkable poll by MORI for BBC's Panorama programme last week suggesting that Labour would be running neck-and-neck with the Conservatives if Mr Healey were leader.

So it must be in Labour's interest to make it seem that only a poiltical pedant would fuss about Mr Foot being Prime Minister in a Labour government. One of the principal tests of the party's campaign will be how far it can convey the impression that, if Labour were elected, he would be required not so much to run an administration as to preside benignly over a team of stars.

Inability to solve leadership problem

The Alliance has so often proclaimed its faith in the principle of collective leadership that it is tempting to accept what it is doing at its own valuation. Yet, for all the ingenuity displayed in sharing responsibility between a Prime Minister-designate and a chairman of the campaign committee, these arrangements reflect the Alliance's inability to solve the leadership problem.

To distribute power among a team is one thing. But for a prospective government to be led into an election by a person who would not lead them in office is a logical absurdity. It is acceptable in this instance only because nobody believes that the Alliance is going to run the country, and it has come about only because Mr Jenkins has disappointed so many Liberals and Social Democrats with his leadership of the SDP. Otherwise he would be the sole, though not an autocratic, leader of the Alliance.

The task for the Alliance now is to give the impression that it has managed not only to share responsibility but also to develop a coherent power structure. It may not be asking us to elect a Prime Minister alone, but is it really offering a government?

Possession 'doctrine' applies to handlers

Regina v Ball (Anthony)
Regina v Winning

Before Lord Lane, Lord Chief Justice, Mr Justice McCullough and Mr Justice Leonard

[Judgment delivered May 13]

The so-called "doctrine of recent possession" was applicable not only to persons found to be in possession of stolen goods but also to handlers io the sense of assisting others in the retention, removal, disposal or realization of stolen goods, within section 22(1) of the Theft Act 1968.

The Court of Appeal so held when dismissing an appeal by Michael Anthony Ball, aged 22, of Brierly Hill, West Midlands, and refusing an application for leave to appeal by Rosanna Jayne Winning, aged 25, of Pensnett, West Midlands, against conviction at Wolverhampton Crown Court (Judge Lee and a jury) on a joint count charging contravention of section 22(1) in that they "dishonestly undertook or assisted in the retention removal disposal or realization of certain stolen goods, namely, 30 Citizens Band transceivers by or for the benefit of another, knowing or believing the same to be stolen". The appellant was ordered to do 160 hours of community service; the applicant was conditionally discharged for 12 months.

Tried jointly with them was Martin Stephen Gordon, who was convicted of burglary io having entered as a trespasser a building in Lawnswood Road, Wordsley, Stourbridge, and stolen therein 122 Citizens Band transceivers. He received a two-year sentence. He did not appeal.

Mr Peter De Mille, assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals, for the appellant and the applicant; Mr Malcolm Lee, QC for the Crown.

MR JUSTICE McCULLOUGH said that the burglary took place on the night of October 27-28, 1981 and within 48 hours Gordon, Ball and Winning were seen by police in an estate car driven by Gordon near Exeter. In the car were 30 of the transceivers.

At the trial none of the three gave evidence. There was evidence that Ball and Winning at least were assisting in the disposal of the goods for Gordon's benefit and that each had lied about how he or she had come to be dealing with them.

In directing the jury the judge said that, if a person had physical contact with stolen property, assisting someone else who had possession of it to dispose of it soon after it was stolen, that might call for an explanadoo and in the absence of some innocent explanadon the jury were entitled to infer guilty knowledge, that the person charged knew or believed the property being dealt with was stolen property.

Mr De Mille submitted that common sense suggested that a person in control of recently stolen goods should be asked to account for his possession and an adverse inference sould be drawn as to his state of mind if he did not give a credible explanation.

However, he submitted, such an inference was not to be drawn in the case of someone who had mere physical contact with the goods at a time when be was acting merely under the directions of a person who had possession.

Shortly, the submission was that the so-called "doctrine of recent possession" should apply only to those whom the jury found to be in possession of stolen property but should not apply to those who were merely handlers in the sense of assisting other people to retain, remove, dispose of or realize stolen property.

*His Lordship said that the so-*called "doctrine of recent possession" was misnamed. It had nothing to do with goods recently possessed but concerned the possession of goods recently stolen. It was oot even a doctrine.

It was no more than an inference which a jury might or might not think it right to draw about the state of mind of a person charged, who was dealing in goods stolen not long beforehand. It was based on common sense.

Stolen goods frequently passed quickly from hand to hand. Many of those who dealt in them, knowing them to have been stolen or believing them to have been stolen, often told lies when asked to explain how the goods came into their possession. Others preferred to give no explanation. That had been the court's experience for generations.

So, when a person charged was found to have been in possession of goods recently stolen and either gave no explanation of how he acquired them innocently or gave an explanation which was patently untrue, it was the practice of judges to draw to the jury's attention that they might, if they thought it right, infer that he acquired them knowing or believing that they were stolen.

The innocent dealer had nothing to fear from that. He had no need to lie and would, in the nature of things, be only too willing to give his explanation.

Before the 1968 Act came into force there was no offence of handling. The offence under section 33 of the Larceny Act 1916 was "receiving", which meant receiving into possesion or control stolen property knowing that it had been stolen.

The provision in section 22(1) of the 1968 Act, which created the offence of handling, was wider than the old offence and embraced two offences: (1) the old offence of receiving; and (2) the offence of assisting.

Inevitably every case in which the question of inference of guilty knowledge arose before 1968 was a case of receiving and, therefore, many of those cases turned on, or touched on, the questioo whether it could be said that the stolen goods passed into the possessioo or control of the person charged.

Save for one passage in R v Sloggett ([1972] 1 QB 430, 433), which was unnecessary for the decision in that case, there was no direct authority on the point in Mr De Mille's submission. None of the textbooks to which reference was *ordinarily made in such circum*stances dealt with the submission save for The Theft Acts 1968 and 1976 by Edward Griew (4th edition (1982) p184 para 1323).

Therefore, the matter had to be considered on principle and as one of logic.

There was, in the court's view, no reason in logic or justice why it should be permissible to draw the inference where the person charged had received stolen goods into his possession but impermissible to draw it when he had merely assisted somebody to deal with stolen goods.

The distinction between the two types of handling lay in the relationship between the person charged and the goods. In each his state of mind was the same.

It was m relation to his state of mind that the jury might think it right to draw the inference.

Doubtless a receiver, knowing or believing that the goods were stolen, *might sometimes enlist the assis*tance of someone without such knowledge or belief. However, such a person was not in peril from the inference.

If the innocent receiver had nothing to fear from it nor, a fortiori, had the innocent assistant

Any view other than that to which the court had come would lead to a wholly artificial position where a person charged faced alternative counts of handling by receiving and handling the same goods by assisting.

In view of section 27(3) (a) and (b) of the Theft Act 1968 the inferences which might have been drawn in cases under the old legislation could now be drawn, exactly as one would expect. Any confirmation of the court's view was to be found in section 27.

The trial judge was correct in his direction about the evidence.

Mr De Mille took a second point, namely, that the judge had not told the jury that one of the essentials of the offence was dishonesty. It was inconceivable that the minds of Ball and Winning could be anything other than dishonest if they knew or believed that the goods were stolen. There was no misdirection on that point, or if there was, it was not a material misdirection in the particular circumstances of the present case.

Talaqs in UK and Kashmir not accepted

Chaudhary v Chaudhary

Before Mr Justice Wood

[Judgment delivered May 13]

Two oral talaqs pronounced in England and in Kashmir by a Kashmiri with an acquired domicile in England were not recognized in the Family Division.

The first talaq took place in London on June 29, 1976 and was caught by the provisions of section 16(1) of the Domicile and Matrimonial Proceedings Act 1973 and the second talaq in Kashmir on May 12, 1978 was not "other proceedings" as provided by section 2(a) of the Recognition of Divorces and Legal Separations Act 1971.

Mr Justice Wood refused to recognize either talaq pronounced by Mr Khan Mohammed Chaudhary and granted a decree nisi to his wife Mrs Bibi Saira Chaudhary.

Section 16 of the 1973 Act provides: "(1) No proceeding in the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man shall be regarded as validly dissolving a marriage unless instituted in the courts of law of one of those countries."

The 1971 Act provides: "2 Sections 3 to 5 of this Act [recognition of overseas divorces] shall have effect, subject to section 8 of this Act, as respects the recognition in Great Britain of the validity of overseas divorces and legal separations, that is to say, divorces and legal separations which – (a) have been obtained by means of judicial or other proceedings in any country outside the British Isles; and (b) are effective under the law of that country.

"8 (2) . . . recognition by virtue of this Act . . . of the validity of a divorce or legal separation obtained outside the British Isles may be refused if, and only if – (a) it was obtained by one spouse – (i) without such steps having been taken for giving notice of the proceedings to the other spouse as, having regard to the nature of the proceedings and all the circumstances, should reasonably have been taken; or . . . (b) its recognition would manifestly be contrary to public policy.

Mr Walter Aylen, QC, for the husband; Miss Davinder Lachhar for the wife.

MR JUSTICE WOOD said that there were two sets of proceedings before him. There was a petition filed by the wife seeking a divorce based oo the husband's adultery and a petition by the husband seeking a declaration that the marriage had been dissolved prior to the wife's petition either by an oral talaq pronounced on June 29, 1976 or by a second oral talaq pronounced on May 12, 1978.

The husband was now aged 50 years and the wife was 46. They were born in Kashmir and married there in December, 1954. There were four children of the marriage – all now over 18 years.

The husband, an aircraft engineer, arrived in England in 1963 leaving wife and children behind in Kashmir. In 1965 the husband set up home with Hamida, the woman with whom he still lived and whom he hoped to marry and who had borne him two sons.

On June 29, 1976 the husband went to the mosque in Shepherd's Bush and pronounced an oral talaq three times in Urdu before two witnesses. By Muslim religious law that was sufficient effective divorce. There was no requirement for any notice to the wife.

It was decided that a written document should be made out recording the talaq and sent to the wife in Kashmir. His Lordship doubted whether the wife ever received that document but was satisfied that she had learnt about the divorce by early 1977.

In July, 1977 the wife arrived at Heathrow and went to live in a house owned by the husband. The wife was dissatisfied. Her husband remained with Hamida.

In February, 1978, following her complaint to the justices of her husband's desertion and failure to maintain, the justices found her complaint proved and awarded her an interim maintenance order of £5 a week.

Oo May 12, 1978 the husband went to Kashmir and once again pronounced talaq three times before two witnesses. In Kashmir only the classical Islamic law applied. The Muslim Family Laws Ordinance 1961 did not apply.

In Kashmir an oral talaq pronounced three times before two witnesses was effective as a final divorce. There was no requirement for a wife to be given notice.

The husband had maintained that he had retained his domicile of origin in Kashmir. However the court had to look to the surrounding circumstances.

All his assets were in England. He was deeply attached to Hamida. She was a professional woman and his Lordship doubted that she would want to live in Pakistan with all its uncertainties. His Lordship was sure that the husband would not go to Pakistan without Hamida.

His Lordship was satisfied that by 1976 the husband had acquired a domicile of choice in England and Wales.

Since 1976 he had been anxious to rid himself of his wife and financial responsibility for her so he had a motive for saying that he had the intention to return to Pakistan.

Mr Aylen had placed greater reliance on the second talaq pronounced in Kasmir, and had submitted that the talaq fell within the words "other proceedings" in section 2(a) of the 1971 Act.

It had been submitted that a "bare" talaq was a proceeding because of the requirement that there must be three pronouncements before two witnesses.

Reliance was placed on the words of Lord Scarman in Quazi v Quazi ([1980] AC 744, 824): "... I construe section 2 as applying to any divorce which has been obtained by means of any proceeding, ie, any act or acts officially recognized as leading to divorce in the country where the divorce was obtained, and which itself is recognized by the law of the country as an effective divorce."

Lord Scarman seemed to his Lordship to be expressing the general principle applicable upon his interpretation of the statutory provisions. The passage did not indicate that Lord Scarman took the view that a "bare" talaq came within the words "other proceedings".

His Lordship found no reason to alter the view he took of a "bare" talaq in Quazi (at p 776). The talaq pronounced in Kashmir was not entitled to recognition under the 1971 Act. The wife had a domicile of choice in England and Wales and the provisions of section 6 had no application.

The first talaq took place in London. That talaq was caught by the provisions of section 16(1) of the 1973 Act.

The sub-section was enacted to overrule the decision in Qureshi v Qureshi ([1972] Fam 173).

Mr Aylen had argued that if a "bare" talaq was not within "other proceedings" of the 1971 Act then it was not a "proceeding" within section 16(1) of the 1973 Act.

His Lordship said that section could have said that no divorce in the United Kingdom, the Channel Isles or the Isle of Man should be valid to dissolve a marriage unless the decree was obtained through due process in the courts of law of one of those countries.

His Lordship had a discretion to refuse recognition either under the 1971 Act or the common law on the ground of public policy. The doctrine of public policy was a creature of the common law. Bearing in mind all the circumstances, recognition of either talaq would be refused on the ground of public policy.

Queen's Bench Divisional Court

Breath test refusal not reasonable

McGrath v Vipas

Before Lord Justice Robert Goff and Mr Justice Mann

[Judgmeot delivered May 12]

A genuine but mistaken belief by a defendant that a police officer was not acting bona fide and did not have an honest belief that the defendant had been driving a motor car did not constitute a reasonable excuse for failing to provide a breath test within the meaning of section 8(3) of the Road Traffic Act 1972.

The Queen's Bench Divisional Court so held, dismissing Sheila McGrath, the defendant's appeal by case stated against her conviction by the Willesden Justices on March 25, 1982.

Mr Richard Slowe for the defendant; Mr Andrew Turton for the prosecuter.

MR JUSTICE MANN, giving the judgment of the court, said that the justices had found that at 11pm on June 15, 1981, a Ford Escort car had been involved in a road accident.

Ten minutes later, acting on information received, the prosecutor, Police Constable Kevin Vipas, had been to an address where the door had been opened to him by the defendant, who wore a dressing gown and who was drunk. The constable had invited her out into the street to take a breath test.

The defendant had refused. The constable had then arrested her for failure to provide a breath test.

The justices had been of the opinion that the constable had had reasonable cause to believe that the defendant had been driving the car involved in the accident, and that that belief had been founded oo reasonable grounds. He had been carrying out his duties in a bona fide manner and the arrest had therefore been lawful.

The justices had concluded that the defendant's belief that the whole procedure was unnecessary if she had not been the driver did not constitute a reasonable excuse for refusing to provide the breath test, and they had convicted her accordingly.

His Lordship then referred to section 8(2) and (3) of the Road Traffic Act 1972. Mr Slowe had contended that it would have been a "reasonable excuse" for the purposes of section 8(3) if the defendant bona fide believed on reasonable grounds that the constable had been acting mala fide, and had no reasonable cause to believe that she had been driving or attempting to drive the vehicle involved in the accident. That the constable had been acting bona fide was irrelevant.

Mr Slowe had relied on the words of Mr Justice Cave in R v Tolson ((1880) 23 QBD 168, 181): "At common law an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of circumstances which if true would make the act for which a prisoner is indicted an innocent act has always been held to be a good defence."

His Lordship said that the expression "reasonable excuse" in the 1972 Act had been considered on many occasions.

In R v Lennard ([1973] 1 WLR 483) the Court of Appeal had held, at p487C, that: "no excuse can be adjudged a reasonable one unless the person from whom the specimen is required is physically or mentally unable to provide it or the provision of the specimen would entail a substantial risk to his health."

In R v Reid (Philip) ([1973]. 1 WLR 1283), the Court of Appeal had rejected an argument that a defendant had a reasonable excuse if he thought that a constable had no power to request a specimen of breath unless there had been an accident, a moving traffic offence or a suspicion of drink from a person's manner of driving.

In the light of the authorities, his Lordship believed that the best approach to the question was to ascertain first whether there had been a valid request to provide a specimen.

A request was valid if (1) an accident had occurred; and (2) the request was made by a constable in uniform, and who (3) had reasonable cause to believe that the persoo requested had been driving or attempting to drive the motor vehicle at the time of the accident.

Where those preconditions had been satisfied, the only remaining question was whether the defendant, without reasonable excuse, had failed to provide a breath test. That assumed the request had been valid, and the defendant's belief at the time of the request that it was invalid was not material.

Accordingly, in their Lordship's judgment, the provisions of sectioo 8 did not admit of an insertion into them of the common law principle for which Mr Slowe had contended, and the appeal would be dismissed.

Court of Appeal

Judge unable to defer sentence upon terms

Regina v Skelton

Before Lord Justice Watkins, Mr Justice Park and Sir John Thompson

[Judgment delivered May 16]

It was not open to a judge to defer sentence upon the basis that he did so subject to the imposition of a condition or the acceptance of an undertaking.

The Court of Appeal so held when allowing an appeal by Michael Ronald Skelton against a total sentence of two years' imprisonment, and allowed his immediate release.

Mr Alastair Sharp, assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals, for the appellant; Mr J. R. Whitley for the prosecutor.

LORD JUSTICE WATKINS, giving the judgment of the court, said that on June 17, 1982, the appellant was convicted at the Newport Crown Court, Isle of Wight (Mr Recorder Mildon, QC) of burglary and theft.

On that occasion he was not represented but told the recorder that he was prepared to give an undertaking that he would enter a hospital for psychiatric treatment and would cooperate with the doctors. The recorder, upon the basis that he accepted that undertaking, deferred sentencing the appellant for six months.

The appellant did not cooperate properly with the hospital authorities. On January 6, 1983 at the same crown court (Judge Galpin) the sentence of two-years' imprisonment was imposed, the judge having heard all about the offences and the way in which sentence had been deferred.

Deferment of sentence was designed to discover whether the subject of it was capable of behaving himself of his own accord during the prescribed period, so that when he was sentenced the court might pass a sentence lighter than otherwise it might have done.

Accordingly, the recorder was mistaken in assuming that he could defer sentence upon the basis of an undertaking that during the period of deferment the appellant would subject himself to some form of medical treatment or become (by way of undertaking or condition) the subject of some kind of discipline.

The judge failed to recognize that lapse and, when passing sentence, made it quite clear that he was taking account of the fact that the appellant had broken the undertaking which he had given to the recorder. That produced the imposition of a more severe sentence than might have been passed otherwise.

When we introduced the Business Class Cabin in 1978, it was the first of its kind.

Now it's kind of a First.

In 1978, British Caledonian invented the Executive cabin on their transatlantic services.

And became the first airline to put businessmen and women in a class of their own.

Since then, of course, almost every other major airline has followed suit.

Business Class has become the norm.

British Caledonian, however, are not content to provide the norm.

Now that other airlines have finally caught up, we're jumping one step ahead again with the arrival of our new Super Executive cabin.

Available now on our Middle East, Far East, North American and South American routes.

It's Business Class by name, but First Class by nature.

It affords complete privacy from other passengers because it is separated with a fixed divider, not a flimsy curtain.

The seats are First Class standard. They're wider. They have a 37" pitch for extra legroom. And a 34° recline for more comfort.

And there are fewer of them. Seven seats abreast instead of the usual nine, to give everyone a little more office space during the flight.

All drinks are complimentary and served in glass, not plastic. Cups, saucers and entrée dishes are china. Tablecloths are linen.

The blankets are First Class size and standard. Pillows and headrests are covered in linen, not paper.

As soon as you take your seat in Super Executive, with its décor in restful tones of brown, we think you'll agree it's a world apart from other Business Class cabins.

And we hope you'll be impressed by the service that goes with it. A service that's talked about around the world.

In 1978, we were the first to recognise that business travellers are a special class of people.

We've treated them as such ever since.

For details contact your travel agent or ring British Caledonian on 01-668 4222.

PUTTING A CROSS IN THE LABOUR BOX IS THE SAME AS SIGNING THIS PIECE OF PAPER.

1. I hereby give up the right to choose which school my children go to and agree to abide by any decision made by the State on my behalf.

2. I empower the Labour Party to take Britain out of Europe, even though my job may be one of the 2½ million which depend on Britain's trade with Europe.

3. I am prepared to see the Police Force placed under political control even though it could undermine their capability to keep law and order.

4. I agree that Britain should now abandon the nuclear deterrent which has preserved peace in Europe for nearly forty years. I fully understand that the Russians are not likely to follow suit.

5. I agree to have the value of my savings reduced immediately in accordance with Labour's wishes to devalue the pound.

6. I empower the government to borrow as much money as they wish from other countries and I agree to let my children pay the debt.

7. I fully agree to a massive expansion of nationalisation, whatever the cost to me in higher taxation.

8. I do not mind if I am forced to join a union. I do not expect to vote for the leaders of that union and do not mind if I am not consulted by secret ballot before being told to strike.

9. I sign away the right to buy my own council house.

10. I do not mind paying higher rates.

11. I am prepared to allow my pension fund to be used by the government to invest in any scheme that they see fit whether or not this shows a good enough return on my investment.

12. I understand that Labour's plans could mean that prices will double once more, as they did under the last Labour government.

13. I realise that the tax cuts from which I will have benefited under a Conservative government may be withdrawn at once.

14. I waive my right to choose any form of private medicine for my family.

The arms race: US and Russia resume INF talks as chemical weapons debate intensifies in Washington

From Nicholas Ashford, Washington

For the second successive year, Congress is poised to reject a request by the Reagan Administration for funds to resume production of chemical weapons.

Although the United States possesses huge stocks of nerve gas and other deadly chemical weapons – sufficient to kill every human being on Earth, according to Mr Ed Bethune (Republican, Arkansas) – no new ones have been produced since former President Nixon announced in 1969 that the United States would stop making chemical and biological weapons.

However, the Administration, concerned that the Soviet Union is building up a big chemical weapons advantage, has been trying to resume production for the past two years. In particular, the Administration wants to start building a new breed of "binary" weapons in which the two chemicals which produce the lethal nerve gas are stored in separate containers and are mixed only just before firing.

The Administration has adopted a similar approach to chemical weapons as it has to intermediate-range nuclear missiles. It maintains that the Soviet Union will seriously consider signing an effective treaty banning chemical weapons only when, in the words of President Reagan, the United States has "reestablished a credible retaliatory chemical capability essential to an adequate deterrent". Hence the Administration's request for almost $1bn (£666m) for chemical warfare in the Pentagon's budget for the fiscal year 1984.

The lion's share is for defensive equipment against a chemical attack and Congress will have no difficulty in approving the funds requested. However, it is $194m being sought to resume production which is likely to be met by a firm congressional "No" when the Department of Defence Authorization Bill is debated by the House of representatives later this week.

The campaign is being led by Mr Bethune, in whose state is situated the Pine Bluffs plant, where the weapons would be made.

Mr Bethune is no liberal on defence matters and is an opponent of the campaign for a nuclear weapons freeze. But on this aspect of the arms race he believes the United States should retain its present high moral ground.

In a letter to the President (and also during a House debate earlier this month) Mr Bethune argued that the United States has a golden opportunity to show the world the sharp contrast between American and Soviet policy on these weapons. He said that, whereas there had been a de facto production freeze in the United States for the past 14 years, the Soviet Union had not only gone on producing such weapons but had been using them in Afghanistan and South-East Asia.

"The world perception of the United States may be that we are partners in crime with the Soviets when it comes to nuclear weapons, but it doesn't have to be that way with chemical weapons," he said.

Last year Mr Bethune tabled an amendment against a resumption of production which was approved in the House by 251 to 159. He expects an even larger margin of support this time.

The mood in Congress has been reinforced by a new report by the General Accounting Office which has said that the new binary bomb, known as "Bigeye", may not work as advertised and may present new safety problems. One of the supposed advantages of binary weapons is that they are safer to handle and transport than unitary ones.

The report found there were a "multitude of unanswered questions related to chemical warfare modernization" and expressed concern that binary weapons could make an eventual chemical weapons agreement more difficult to verify.

The Administration, which plans to spend between $6bn and $7bn over the next five years improving the United States chemical weapons capability, appears determined not to be put off by congressional resistance. The Army has been carrying out a massive lobbying campaign which has included testimony by Dr Theodore Gold, the Pentagon's chief chemical weapons specialist, who pointed out that more than 70 per cent of existing United States stocks were either unserviceable or in need of extensive renovation.

Even if Congress were to approve a resumption of production, there would still be the question of deployment. The most obvious theatre for their deployment would be West Europe, but America's Nato allies have refused to allow storage of new chemical weapons on their soil.

Dr Gold said no decisions had been taken on deployment and that the weapons would be sent overseas only "after full consultation with the nations involved." Some Pentagon officials clearly believe it will be considerably easier to deal with Nato governments than it is with their own legislators.

Talking again: Mr Yuli Kvitsinsky greeting Mr Paul Nitze of the United States at the Soviet mission in Geneva when the arms negotiations resumed yesterday.

More flexibility at Geneva

From Alan McGregor, Geneva

The first meeting in the resumed American-Soviet negotiations on controlling medium-range missiles in Europe lasted two hours and provided Mr Paul Nitze, the US delegation leader, with an opportunity to expand on the Reagan "interim" proposal.

He first handed over details of this to his Soviet counterpart, Mr Yuli Kvitsinsky, on March 29, the last day of the previous round, the fifth.

Yesterday's meeting was held at the Soviet diplomatic mission. The next will be on Thursday at the US diplomatic offices, farther down the hopefully-named avenue de la Paix.

The two delegation leaders – Mr Nitze at 76 is 30 years the Russian's senior – posed for the cameras but avoided the microphones.

Mr Nitze had already indicated that his top priority was trying to persuade the Russians of the merits of the Reagan proposal, irrespective of its having been publicly rejected in Pravda. He has also made the point that there is "more latitude" now in the mandate he has from the Administration than at any time since the negotiations started 18 months ago.

Possible flexibility on the Soviet side also is implied in Mr Yuri Andropov's recent proposal that the count in an East-West tactical nuclear balance be based on warheads rather than on delivery systems. Each of the 351 Soviet SS20s trained on Western Europe has three independently-targeted warheads.

Beyond that, however, the Russians continue to insist that the overall tally include not only aircraft with delivery capacity but also the independent British and French deterrents.

These are, respectively, 64 submarine-borne Polaris missiles with 102 warheads, not independently targetable, and 80 submarine-launched and 18 land-based missiles, all single warheads.

Mitterrand blames American policy for world recession

From Diana Geddes, Paris

As the dollar rose to a record on the foreign exchanges of 7.42 francs against the French currency, President Mitterrand yesterday attacked the American budget deficit and high interest rates for being one of the principal causes of the world economic recession.

The same there is likely to dominate a two-day meeting starting in Paris today of the heads of six Socialist countries – France, Sweden, Finland, Greece, Portugal and Senegal – whose aim is to draw up a "Socialist response to the economic crisis" less than a fortnight before the summit of the seven main industrialized nations in Williamsburg. France is the only Socialist country that will be attending the summit.

At a press conference at the end of a two-day Franco-German summit, M Mitterrand said it was "not right that the American budget should be paid by us, that that deficit should lead to high interest rates, and that the dollar, now at record levels, should be one of the causes of the world economic imbalance".

Herr Helmut Kohl, the West German Chancellor, was much more restrained in his comments, saying simply that the economic situation in Europe was "influenced" by United States budget policy and high interest rates, and that the problem of the high value of the dollar would be the subject of intensive discussions at Williamsburg. He did not like to criticize the policies of a friendly country in its absence, he added.

In bilateral economic matters, some progress was made towards solving the problem of France's huge trade deficit with West Germany, which the French Government believes is in part due to restrictive German "technical norms", which it claims, impede the export of French products to Germany.

Herr Kohl said Bonn would try to deal with those norms immediately.

There was a complete identity of view on defence and security. M Mitterrand and Herr Kohl both reaffirmed their backing for the Nato "dual-track" decision on medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe, insisting that, while they still hoped for a favourable outcome to the Geneva arms talks, they would support the deployment of cruise and Pershing missiles in the event of the breakdown of those negotiations.

Herr Kohl described the talks as intense, frank, sincere and friendly, and expressed his particular appreciation for the invitation to breakfast at M Mitterrand's private home near Notre Dame, in the Latin Quarter, followed by an unexpected walk by the two heads of state in sparkling sunshine along the Boulevard St Germain, the scene of many of the recent violent disturbances between students and police.

Diplomats are spies, Quick says

Bonn (Reuter) – The right-wing magazine Quick yesterday named four Soviet diplomats working in West Germany whom it alleged were spies.

It accused a second secretary Mr Yevgeny Shmagin, of trying to exert "Communist influence" in the West German anti-nuclear movement and a military attaché, Mr Viktor Marchenko, of trying to acquire technology secrets. Quick also alleged that two trade envoys, Mr Boris Koshevnikov and Mr Oleg Shevchenko, were spy-masters.

Sources close to the West German intelligence services said the report was true.

Mr Shmagin was at his desk in the embassy yesterday. He sounded shocked by the charges and said he had not read the report. He declined further comment. It was not clear whether the other three officials were still in West Germany.

The magazine said Mr Shevchenko, aged 37, was one of four Soviet spies uncovered recently by West German and other Western security services as "high security risks".

It said he betrayed himself when he inadvertently gave away a business card with a list of car registration numbers on the back. When the card was passed to West German intelligence, the numbers were found to be those of their own observation cars.

Mr Marchenko, an air attaché, aged 46, was described as a Soviet military intelligence agent, who had cultivated wide contacts in the Defence Ministry.

Compromise hope in Stern crisis

From Michael Binyon
Hamburg

More than 1,000 journalists and staff from Stern and nine other magazines published by the Gruner and Jahr company repeated their demands at mass meetings yesterday for the resignation of Herr Gerd Schulte-Hillen, the board chairman, who has been most closely identified with the Hitler diaries fiasco. They also called for the resignation of Herr Henri Nannen and the two new editors appointed last week.

The publishers' representatives were due to meet Stern staff yesterday evening and were expected to offer a compromise to end the crisis at the magazine. Top managers are said to be concerned at the severe damage to the reputation of Stern and by the possible serious financial consequences of the staff revolt.

Angry speakers at two packed meetings lasting almost all day attacked the management for incompetence and misjudgment over the diaries affair and for going behind the staff's backs in the swift appointment of the new editors.

Speaker did not deny the professional competence of Herr Peter Scholl-Latour and Herr Johannes Gross, but said they would not uphold Stern's left-wing political line.

It is suggested that a possible compromise could include the nomination of another editor acceptable to the staff, but it sees clear that Herr Schulte-Hellen's continuation as chairman of the board is now in doubt.

Carrington tipped for Nato post

From Frederick Bonnart
Brussels

Mr Leo Tindemans, the Belgian Foreign Minister, said yesterday that he understood it had almost been decided that Lord Carrington would be the next Secretary-General of Nato.

There have been a number of hints in the Belgian press that Mr Tindemans would like the post himself, but at the end of the annual meeting of the Council of the Western European Union of which he is this year's chairman, he denied all knowledge of his own candidature.

Dr Joseph Luns, aged 72, has been Secretary-General for almost 12 years and has until now always said that he had no intention of resigning. However, during an interview last week, he said that he had decided to leave, although he could not give the exact date.

Informed sources in Brussels consider it likely that he will not wish to leave until the stationing of American medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe has been completed. He is therefore likely to announce his departure at the end of the year.

Decade of torture in Pinochet's Chile

By Richard Dowden

Torture has been used constantly by the Pinochet regime in Chile since it overthrew the Government of Dr Salvador Allende in 1973, according to Amnesty International.

In a report published today, the human rights organization says that the Central Nacional de Informaciones, Chile's state security police, was chiefly responsible. It has at least one secret torture centre in Santiago.

The report, Chile: Evidence of Torture, is based on interviews and medical examinations of 19 former detainees in April and May of last year by an Amnesty mission to Chile which included two doctors.

The detainees said they were tortured at different times between March, 1980, and April, 1982, while in the custody of the Chilean secret police.

The report says the mission found no discrepancies between the detainees' complaints and their own findings.

Amnesty is particularly concerned by the conclusion that trained medical staff may have taken an active part in torture. It also concludes that emergency legislation now in force in Chile allows torture to continue and the Chilean courts take no effective action to prevent it.

Among the cases Amnesty reports:

● A 19-year-old trainee social worker who was raped four times, tortured with electric shocks, then forced to lie beside a decomposing corpse. She was told it was the body of the man she had lived with.

● A human rights worker who suffered from epilipsy was given electric shock torture after being tied naked to a metal bed. He claimed a doctor examined him between torture sessions.

● A 24-year-old carpenter said he was tortured for 16 days several times a day.

Amnesty concludes that the persistence and consistency of the allegations "have caused the organization to regard it as beyond reasonable doubt that the use of torture has been a constant feature of security force practice."

A spokesman for the Chilean Embassy in London said he had no immediate comment on the report.

Exiled Bolivian colonel held on drugs charge

From Andrew Thompson, Buenos Aires

Colonel Luis Arce Gomez, the former Bolivian Interior Minister exiled in Argentina, has been arrested here. He faces extradition to the United States on drug trafficking charges.

Despite the lack of official information, it was revealed that Colonel Arce Gomez was arrested on Monday and, after a preliminary inquiry by court officials, was transferred to a Buenos Aires prison. The extradition request was transmitted through Interpol. Under existing Argentine laws, the colonel can be held for 45 days while the courts decide.

Colonel Arce Gomez became prominent in Bolivia after the 1980 military coup which brought a right-wing regime under General Luis Garcia Meza to power. He was widely accused of using his position as Interior Minister to run the cocaine export business.

He has been accused by Mr Stanley Marcus, the federal prosecutor of Miami, of demanding "protection" payments from Bolivian cocaine producers, and coordinating cocaine exports to the United States.

Days before the end of the Bolivian military regime, the colonel was appointed military attaché in the Buenos Aires Embassy. The new civilian government of President Hernan Siles Suazo cancelled the appointment, but Colonel Arce Gomez, who arrived in Argentina in October 1982, stayed on. In December, Argentina granted him political asylum.

Cabinet changes in La Paz are completed

Three ministers had resigned earlier this month, plunging the Government into its second political crisis since it ended 17 years of almost uninterrupted military rule seven months ago.

Last week Señor Marcial Tamayo, the presidential adviser, was appointed Foreign Minister. The new Minister of Rural Affairs is Señor Reynaldo Mercado, a peasants leader, while Marcelo Barron Roodon took the portfolio of industry, commerce and tourism.

The Cabinet crisis coincided with stalemated talks between the Government and militant tin miners who have occupied the state-owned mining concern Comibol

Walker claims British success

EEC farm prices rise by 4%

From Ian Murray
Brussels

Price rises for EEC farm products averaging a modest 4.2 per cent were finally agreed by agriculture ministers in Brussels early yesterday after 14 hours of hard bargaining. The settlement means at least an extra 8 per cent for French farmers, which it was hoped would be enough to stop their destructive border protests. It also was low enough to allow Mr Peter Walker, the British Agriculture Minister, to make the vote-catching claim that housewives would scarcely notice the increase.

Mr Poul Dalsager, the EEC's Agriculture commissioner, said this was the first occasion he could remember that ministers had not pushed up the Commission's proposals. This, he felt, reflected the genuine concern that farm price rises could bankrupt the Community.

Commission sources estimated the total cost this year at about £260m, and a further £447m next year. According to Herr Ignaz Kiechle, the West German minister presiding, this money could be found within the Community's available resources this year, but tough measures to control surpluses would be needed next year if the EEC was not to run out of money.

This warning was clearly meant to concentrate further the minds of EEC foreign ministers due to meet in Brussels next Tuesday to discuss the size of the British budget rebate for 1983 and to seek a blueprint for future financing. The danger of running out of money next year has become that much more real as a result of the settlement.

Mr Walker said the settlement proved that the British Government had once again served both housewife and farmer well. He felt the increase for farmers was fair and was particularly pleased that some extra cash had been found for Britain's beleaguered pig breeders.

But he was most pleased that the deal would put less than one halfpenny in the pound on food prices and would have virtually no effect on the cost of living index. Last year, he pointed out, food price increases caused by the settlement had added only 1 per cent to the inflation rate, compared with 1 per cent a fortnight under Labour.

He also claimed that food subsidies reaching the British housewife were in the region of £300m a year. Of this, £84m was in the form of a special butter subsidy worth 2p a lb. He had argued that it was better to increase the butter subsidy in this way than to provide money to help export butter to the Soviet Union.

Mr Walker felt he had done much better than M Michel Rocard, his French colleague, who had been unable to get extra help for small farmers. In Mr Walker's view, France had suffered at the negotiating table as a direct result of the "irresponsible and illegal" actions of French farmers in destroying agricultural imports.

M Rocard, however, emerged to claim that he had won "a good agreement." Most important of all for French farmers, he said, he had been able to close the gap between the weak "green franc" and the strong "green mark", which will ease French food exports to West Germany.

Because the Commission had persuaded the Council that there was no point in pressing for higher price rises, the negotiations hinged on fixing new exchange rates for the green currencies.

The adjustments mean that French farmers will receive just over 8 per cent more on average. Britain and Denmark alone will receive rises roughly in line with the 4.2 per cent average. West Germany and Holland, with the strongest currencies in the Community, had to accept rises of about 1 per cent below the average. The other countries can expect rises of between 2.5 and 6 per cent above the average.

● LONDON: The National Farmers' Union said that the increase of 4 per cent was "not as bad as expected," Hugh Clayton writes. The Food Manufacturers' Federation, which represents grocery processors, said that the increase, the lowest for some years, showed welcome signs of restraint. But the federation still wanted reform of the common agricultural policy.

The impact on inflation will be negligible. The most conspicuous effects will be on dairy produce, like butter and cheese, which may soon go up by about 2p a lb. There will be small rises on sugar, bread, biscuits, cake and some meat.

Standing up to be counted: Supporters return President Moi's wave as he leaves Parliament after announcing the election.

From Charles Harrison, Nairobi

President Moi yesterday ordered parliamentary elections in September, a year before they are due. His decision followed an unprecedented political crisis which followed his recent announcement that an unnamed Kenyan was being groomed by a foreign power to become President.

At yesterday's meeting of the governing council of the ruling Kenya African National Union (Kanu), President Moi did not name the man he had referred to. But he said he stood by his original remarks.

The meeting, attended by 130 representatives of Kanu from all parts of Kenya, took place in the parliamentary building behind closed doors, and lasted less than an hour.

President Moi said: "From the day I took over as President of this republic, I have appealed for unity, hard work and being mindful of people's welfare. I have also repeatedly emphasized the Nyayo (footsteps) philosophy of love, peace and unity."

He was grateful to Kenyans who had supported his philosophy, but he had been concerned and disappointed with the performance of some ministers and top officials.

"At times such people have conducted themselves in a manner which leads me to question their loyalty to me as head of state, to their Government and to this country", he said.

Because of their greed and selfishness, it had proved difficult to eliminate corruption and to reconstruct the country's economy.

"I am aware that some of these people have been playing some part in getting the external press to say some adverse things about our country", he added.

"It is absurd that some of these people I have appointed to senior positions have outwardly pretended to be loyal to me – and yet behind the scenes they have been using their positions to promote their selfish ambitions.

He said the patience he had shown since 1978 was exhausted. "From now on any leader or public officer who conducts himself in a suspicious manner will not only be required to resign or be dismissed, but will also face disciplinary action.

"I am determined to rectify the weaknesses which we have been witnessing in the Government because of the conduct of these evil-minded people. In order to clean the system I have therefore decided that all elected leaders, including myself, will seek fresh mandates from the electorate. General elections will take place in September."

President Moio said he would meanwhile embark on an exercise "to sort out problems within the civil service." He added: "Our security forces are loyal and vigilant. They are ready all the time to defend the country, the people and the elected Government against any attempt to interfere with the smooth running of the Government." He gave no details of the problems within the civil service to which he had referred. Parliamentary elections in Kenya take place on a universal adult franchise. Although there is provision for the President to be elected in the same way, he has always been returned unopposed and this will again be the case in September, since President Moi, in his capacity as President of Kanu, will be the party candidate.

Mr Charles Njonjo, the Minister for Constitutional Affairs, who had said on his return from Europe that he had never sought any post in Kenya with foreign support, was not present at yesterday's meeting.

The reaction of many Kenyans was one of surprise that no "traitor" had been named by President Moi. It is now likely that the hysteria of the past week, during which frequent calls have been made for the "traitor" to be named, will subside as preparations for the elections get under way.

Catalan bank crash worries Madrid

From Richard Wigg, Madrid

The Spanish Government, which has done everything not to upset the country's private banking system, yesterday was faced by demands to nationalize Catalonia's stricken regional bank, the Banca Catalana. The demands came from both the Socialist Party in Catalonia and the bank's own staff.

Employees at the Barcelona headquarters announced that it would stay open indefinitely, while colleagues were travelling by road to Madrid to stage a demonstration outside the Prime Minister's office.

The bank's senior staff were reported to be almost unanimously against one plan which would involve selling off the Banca Catalana to a pool made up of Spain's leading private banks. Their attitude was publicly endorsed by the Catalan economists' professional organization.

Señor Miguel Boyer, the Economics and Finance Minister, believed to have regarded the private rescue operation as cheaper for the state, now faces antagonizing either the Madrid private bankers or his own Socialist Party reinforced.

A third possible solution, under which the Bank of Spain would consider a sale to "La Caixa", Catalonia's leading savings and pension bank, would conflict with a Socialist election pledge.

On Monday, the Catalan Socialist Party recommended that the Government nationalize the Banca Catalana and then gradually return it to Catalan public institutions.

Father Jankowski: False allegations.

Protest at slurs on Walesa

From Roger Boyes
Warsaw

A group of Polish shipyard workers, claiming to represent tens of thousands of employees throughout the Baltic coast, have lodged a strong protest about the government propaganda campaign against Mr Lech Walesa, the former Solidarity leader, and his priest. They have issued a veiled threat of industrial action should the attacks continue.

In a letter to the Sejm, the Polish Parliament, the workers say: "We warn that continued campaigns of this kind will encounter our tangible and severe response. The whole working class of the country will join us if we call upon them. Do not let anybody think that this warning can be treated lightly."

The letter, written on the official stationery of the construction and project department of the Lenin Shipyard in Gdansk, has been signed by representatives of 13 shipyards and industrial plants.

Both Mr Walesa and his priest, Father Henryk Jankowski, have come in for sharp criticism from the official press. The idea seems to be to discredit the notion that the Government can be pressured into talking to the former union leader.

Solidarity, now outlawed, had hoped that the twin pressure of May Day demonstrations and the need to make some concessions before the papal visit next month would lead to some form of talks. The government has dismissed this and has responded by mocking Mr Walesa as a "sparrow posing as a hawk".

The workers' letter, which is also addressed to cardinal Jozef Glemp, the Polish Primate, makes clear that the Gdansk shipyards, where Mr Walesa now works as an electrician, is still behind the solidarity chairman.

The letter defends Father Jankowski against press allegations that his father had collaborated with the Germans during the war.

From Harry Debelius, Madrid

A few dozen farmers, professors and artists are fighting a quixotic battle to save a vast private estate, teeming with wildlife, from being turned into Europe's biggest aerial gunnery range.

They are few because the district in which the 60,000-acre estate is located – in the hills between Toledo and Ciudad Real – has a population of only 15,000. They have moral support, however, from many ecology-minded individuals and organizations in Spain and abroad, including the International Society for the Preservation of Birds under the presidency of the Duke of Edinburgh.

Their battle to save the Cabañeros area seems destined to failure because the Defence Ministry has apparently already bought the private hunting estate. Repeated sit-ins, marches and other protest actions have had little repercussion beyond Ciudad Real, the nearest city, which is 40 miles away from Alcoba de los Montes, the township which includes Cabañeros.

In addition to being an old shooting ground for General Franco and his ministers, Cabañeros is the home of 40 pairs of imperial eagles, of which only a few hundred are thought to be left in the world. It also abounds in other wildlife including black storks, black vultures, deer, wild boar, lynxes, wildcats and rabbits.

The flora contain species found nowhere else, according to Professor Manuel Peinado of the University of Alcalá de Henares, where Cervantes once studied.

Professor Peinado wrote his doctoral thesis about the plantlife at Cabañeros. He argues that the bombardment of the area will alter the cycle by which the soil is regenerated, will destroy ground cover and lead to extensive erosion, with silting problems in rivers downstream. He says that highly combustible trees and shrubs will be destroyed by fire and much of the area will be turned into a desert, with no possibility of reestablishing the ecological balance.

Wildlife, he says, will be driven out of the area and possibly to extinction; even the birds of prey will suffer because their hunting grounds will be depopulated.

Ranchers in the surrounding area fear that the constant explosions and the roar of the aircraft will damage their livestock.

Spanish Air Force sources say the Cabañeros gunnery range will pay for itself in less than five years as a result of the fuel saved by aircraft which will use it. Cabañeros is more centrally located in relation to Spanish air bases than the smaller Las Bardenas range currently in use near Saragossa.

Emergency in Sri Lanka

From Our Correspondent, Colombo

The Sri Lanka Government declared a national state of emergency from 5pm today to minimize the possibility of violence after polling ends in 18 parliamentary by-elections.

Polling for seats on 46 local bodies in areas where no by-elections are being held will take place from today until Friday. The government announced yesterday that police had received information that certain groups might cause trouble today but that the state of emergency would be lifted soon if conditions remained normal.

Organized crime 'out of control' in Australia

Sydney (Reuter) – Organized crime, ranging from prostitution to horse race fixing and pornography, is out of control in Australia, according to an official report just out.

Controlling organized crime one of the challenges of the decade, Mr Douglas Meagher, a lawyer member of a royal commission investigating the activities of the Ship Painters' and Dockers' Union said. He drew up the 213-page report, covering all forms of organized crime, as a discussion paper

Hongkong has become the financial centre for a very large number of Australian criminal organizations, the Meagher report said.

It outlined some of the criminal activities: Australian criminals have developed a worldwide expertise in shoplifting and have made organized raids on London and other European cities; One or two horse races are fixed somewhere in Australia on every racing day; Pornography, including the use of children, has become big business.

The report also said that organized crime receives a large income through fixed gambling games, such as dice and roulette; Australian girls are being supplied to brothels in Asia and the Pacific and girls from those regions are being brought to Australia.

Mr Meagher also alleged that one or two unions were involved in racketeering, including extortion from employers.

His report is to be discussed this week by a conference of the Australian and New Zealand Association for the Advancement of Science.

The report states that much of Australia's pornography involves drugged children filmed performing sexual acts.

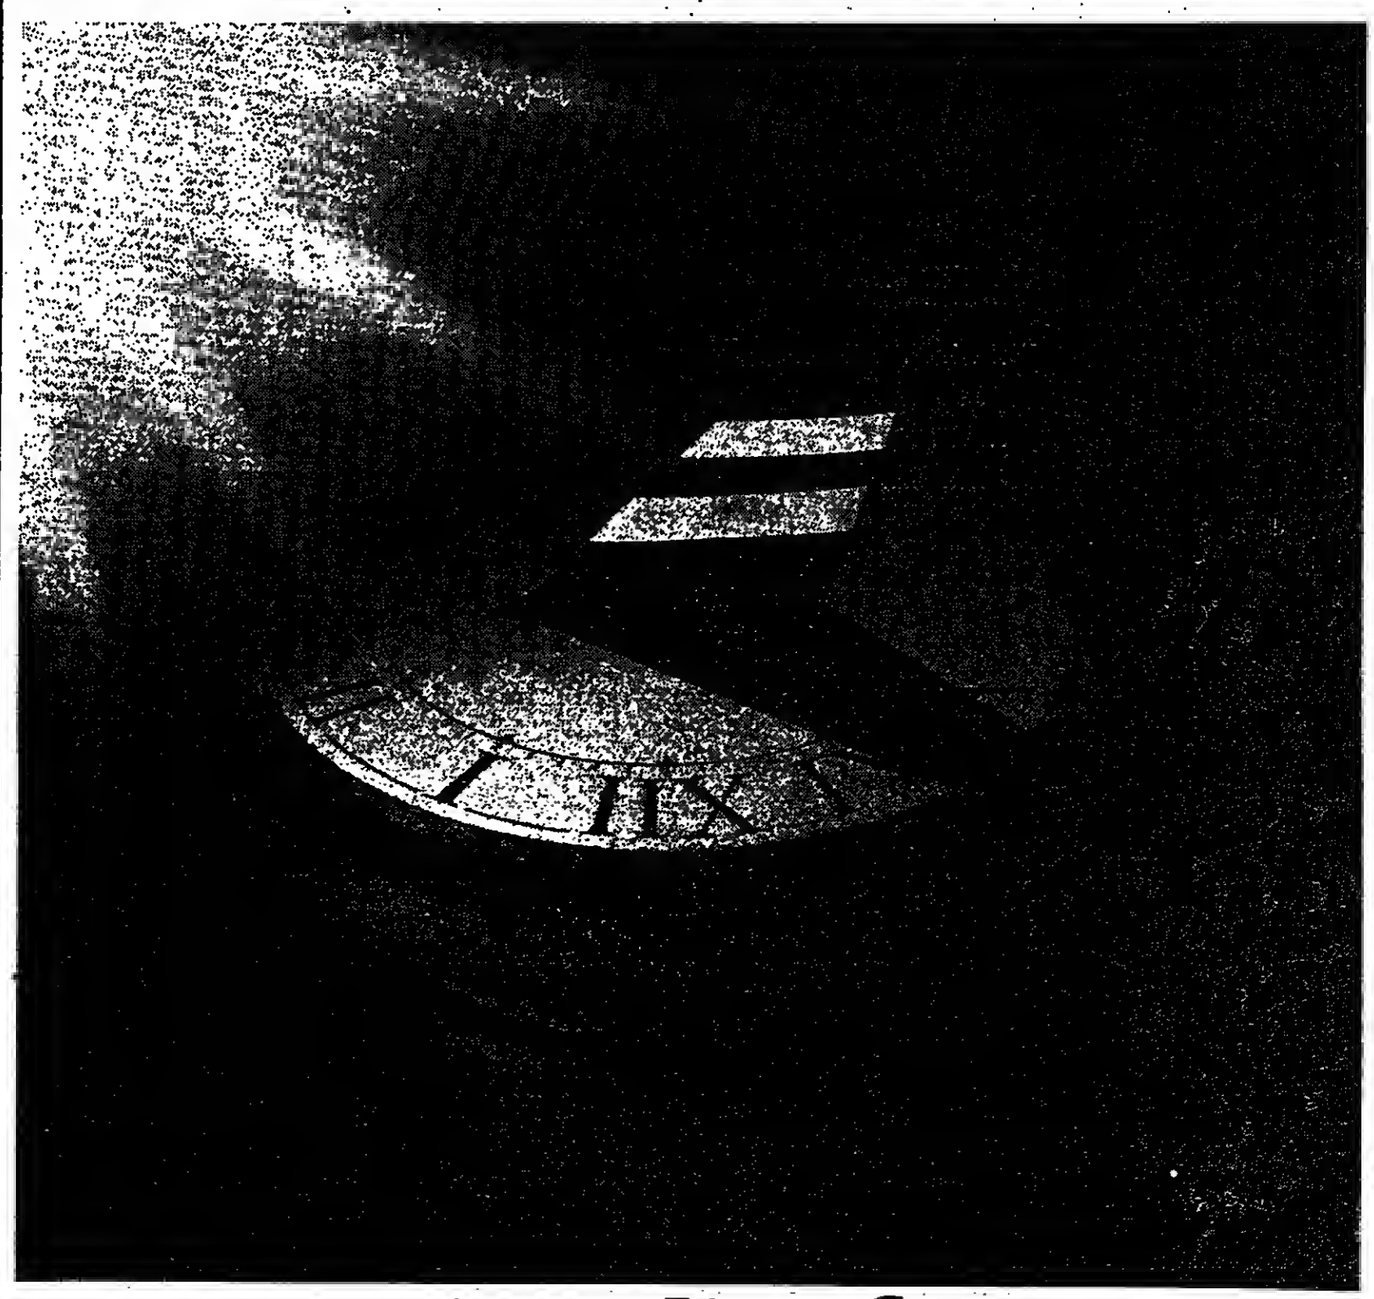
Security papers to be published by approval only

From Tony Duboudin
Melbourne

The Federal Government and the National Times weekly newspaper reached an agreement yesterday on the publication of three more articles in a series on Australia's security services.

In the High Court Sir Harry Gibbs, the Chief Justice, was told that the newspaper had undertaken to publish an approved version of the articles. The hearing followed an interim injunction granted to the Federal Government earlier this month to stop the newspaper publishing further articles based on secret intelligence documents.

The Federal Government has agreed to the publication of approved versions of the articles provided that the National Times does not publish any additional material.



11a.m. every day of the year London to Hong Kong

Every day of the year at 11am, a Cathay Pacific 747 leaves Gatwick for the East.

Those passengers who leave us in Bahrain do so in time for dinner and a good night's rest.

Those who stay with us right through to Hong Kong enjoy the standards of service and comfort which prompted a leading travel magazine to vote us 'Best Airline to the Far East'.

For some, of course, Hong Kong is only the beginning. For every week, one hundred and forty Cathay Pacific flights leave Kai Tak airport for a total of twenty-one Far Eastern destinations.

See your travel agent or call us on 01-930 7878 for full details of our daily service to Bahrain and Hong Kong. But don't expect us to send you our timetable. You're looking at it.

The Middle East balance of power: Israel's second pact with an Arab neighbour provokes Damascus into swift retaliation

From Robert Fisk, Damascus

Syria responded angrily to the signing of the Israeli-Lebanese troop withdrawal accord yesterday by ordering its Army to close all roads across Lebanon between the Israeli and Syrian front lines, claiming publicly that the Lebanese Government of President Gemayel had "lost its legitimacy".

Violent leading articles in the government-controlled press in Damascus – unparalleled in their ferocity even by Syrian standards – gave chilling warning that "nobody in the Lebanese authorities will escape punishment . . . "

Syrian troops on the Beirut-Damascus highway at Sofar, just half a mile from the Israeli front line above Beirut, were the first to cut off communication between eastern Lebanon and the capital. They turned back all motorists trying to reach Beirut and then closed the mountain road through Hammana.

Just over an hour after Israeli and Lebanese delgates had attended the second signing ceremony at Kiryat Shmona, all telephone lines between Beirut and the Syrian-controlled eastern Lebanese town of Zahle, which pass through Syrian positions in the mountains, went dead. The telephone authorities in Beirut confirmed the lines had beeo cut but could offer oo explanation.

On the face of it, yesterday's action by Syria is the gravest sign so far that Syria has no intention of softening its opposition to the withdrawal agreement. Over the past eight months, Israeli troops in the mountains above Beirut have often closed the international highway without warning for up to 24 hours. But if Syria refuses to reopen the roads within the next two days, it will have effectively started the partition of Lebanon.

Embassy bombs

Athens (AP) – A bomb went off outside the Syrian Embassy in an Athens suburb early yesterday and another at a nearby private school atteded by children of Libyan embassy staff. A Syrian car was destroyed but no injuries were caused.

Only last week, Mr Elie Salem, the Lebanese Foreign Minister, was in Damascus trying to persuade President Assad to accept the formula drawn up with the assistance of Mr George Shultz, the American Secretary of State, for the Israeli Army to move out of Lebanon. Yet only yesterday, the authorities here were denouncing the Lebanese Government as illegitimate.

The oewspaper Al Thawra said that "those who cooperated with or surrendered to Israel by accepting the agreement will pay for what they have done". Echoing the same sentiment, the daily Al Baath, the newspaper of the ruling Syrian Baath Party, announced that "nobody in the Lebanese authorities will escape punishment, whatever his position may be".

The Lebanese Government, the paper said, "has lost its legitimacy, as well as its capability and competence in directing the Lebanese people and becomes a full partner of Israel and the United States in their schemes against the Arab World".

Mr Abdul Halim Khaddam, the Syrian Foreign Minister, meanwhile expanded his Government's objections in an interview with the left-wing Beirut oewspaper As-Safir. He claimed that the withdrawal agreemeot and the original Camp David accord betweeo Presideot Sadat of Egypt and Mr Menachem Begin, the Israeli Prime Minister were "two faces of one coin".

Mr Khaddam implied that President Gemayel had acted like Marshal Petain, the wartime French leader

Yesterday's events quite overshadowed the continuing divisions in the ranks of the Palestine Liberation Organization, where guerrilla officers based in the Bekaa Valley of eastern Lebanon, have been demanding that Mr Yassir Arafat, the PLO chairman, should refuse any further suggestions of a compromise peace with Israel.

It transpired yesterday that one reason for their disenchantment sprang from a decisioo by Mr Arafat to appoint two new military commanders in the Bekaa. Both men had been PLO officers in southern Lebanon when the Israeli Amry invaded last June, and both are believed to have fled their posts under fire.

Mr Arafat remained in Damascus yesterday but scrupulously avoided condemning the Israeli-Lebanese withdrawal agreement, commenting only that the PLO supported those Lebanese politicians who opposed the accord.

Syria may decide to reopen the roads across Lebanon today, treating the affair only as a further warning to the Lebanese Government. But if they are oot freely open to all traffic, the Syrians will presumably coosider some form of identity check, inevitably giving the front line the appearance of an international frootier.

The process of extending Lebanese authority over these units and civil guard, under the supervision of the security arrangements committee, shall start immediately after the entry into force of the present agreement and shall terminate prior to the completion of the Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon.

Strike wave engulfs France

From Diana Geddes, Paris

The Paris Metro and mai_ line train services throughout France are expected to be severely disrupted today as members of the Force Ouvriere, one of the three largest trade uoioo federations, hold a "day of actioo". The protest is against the Government's austerity measures and its alleged lack of consultation with the unioo.

The uuneasy atmosphere of a government under siege is cootinuing as further strikes aod demonstrations are anoounced.

Tomorrow, dockers and customs officials are due to hold 24 hour strikes, the former in pursuit of claims for higher pay, aod the latter in support of demands for more jobs.

Meanwhile, secoodary school teachers are cootinuing their fortnight of actioo in protest against inadequate educational resources, and gravediggers and fuoeral parlour workers in Paris pursue their strike in support of demands for better working cooditions.

The results of a ballot of medical students, announced yesterday, showed a majority in favour of accepting compromise proposals on Government plans to reform medical education, which were put forward last week by Governmeot appointed mediators. It is, however, by no means certain that the vote will end the three-month strike by medical students.

The situation last night appeared confused with some students voting for the compromise package but against the resumption of courses, while others voted against the package but for the end of the strike.

Students io Paris occupied the Sorbonne and the Gare Montparnasse for a couple of hours yesterday but left calmly when the police arrived. By late afternooo, there were no reports of any incidents in the capital.

A demonstratioo by shopkeepers on Monday evening, however, had again led to a violent batton charge by riot police, in which several people were injured, including a televisioo journalist, wearing an official press armband.

Recent complaints of police brutality against journalists prompted M Georges Fillioud, the Minister for Communications, to write yesterday to M Joseph Franceschi, the Minister for State Security, asking him to reoew his instructions to police chiefs "to take the necessary precautions to avoid the repetition of this kind of incident".

The Ministry of Defence confirmed a oewspaper report that six squadrons of military police belonging to a tank regiment were standing by oo the outskirts of Paris. However, it denied firmly that there was any inteotioo of bringing tanks ioto the capital.

It seems unlikely that yesterday's agreement by EEC ministers oo agricultural prices (report, page 11) will bring the Freoch Goverument a respite from demonstrations by farmers either. One of the main farm unions has already denounced the increases as inadequate.

● Jobless fall: The number of unemployed in France fell again slightly in April for the sixth consecutive month to 2,017,000 (seasonally adjusted), the Employment Ministry announced. Uoemployment has risen by only 1.1 per cent over the past year.

Russians reinforce garrison

Islamabad (Reuter)–The Soviet Union may have sent a new division-sized force of up to 6,000 troops to Afghanistan, Western diplomats reported yesterday.

They said the troops arrived, probably over the past few weeks, in the provincial capital of Herat, oear the border with Iran and the scene of receot heavy fighting with insurgeots. It was not clear if they were reinforcemeots for the 105,000 Soviet troops already in Afghanistan.

Soviet troops are usually replaced by fresh units during April and May and the Herat force could be a replacement for a similar force in another part of the country.

The diplomats said however that recent reports indicated more Soviet troops were arriving io Afghanistan than were leaving as part of the rotatioo system. It was the first time since the Soviet intervenoion of Afghanistan that their troops had been stationed at Herat.

New effort to end Gulf war

Tehran (Reuter) – Ministers from two Gulf states met President Khamanei of Iran yesterday on the second day of a missioo which informed sources said was aimed at presenting a new plan to end the Iran-Iraq war.

The meeting coincided with the arrival in Tehran oo Mr Mohammad Ben Ahmed Abdelghani, the Algerian Prime Minister, for talks which also appeared aimed at bringing peace.

Arab and Iranian officials say the two gulf envoys, Shakh Sabah al-Ahmed al-Sabah, the Kuwait Foreign Minister, and Mr Rashid bin Abdulla al-Nuaimi, United Arab Emirates Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, are here to discuss the huge oil slick caused by damaged Iranian oil wells in the Gulf.

Oo Sunday Mr Ali Akbar Yellayati, the Iranian Foreign Minister, said the Gulf ministers' visit had nothing to do with ending the war.

Tehran radio quoted president Khameoei as telling the envoys to "show seriousness" so efforts to solve the oil slick problems would produce results. Iranian reports have said Tehran urged the Gulf ministers to put pressure on Iraq over the oil slick.

The Gulf envoys had been expected to move oo to Baghdad by yesterday for talks there before reporting back to a meeting of six Arab oil states in Saudi Arabia today.

The oumber of meetings they have with Iranian leaders appears to suggest that whatever has been discussed has been substannial.

Moscow accepts Reagan offer on grain sales

Washington (Reuter, AP) – The Soviet Union has accepted President Reagan's offer to start negotiating a new long-term grain deal, administration officials said yesterday.

Mr Reagan, who suspended talks on a new agreement 16 months ago after the imposition of martial law in Poland, offered to resume them last mooth, under pressure from financially strickeo American farmers.

Mr Richard Lyng, the Deputy Agriculture Secretary, said Moscow's acceptance, conveyed on Monday night by Mr Anatoly Dobrynin, the Soviet Ambassador, to Mr George Shultz, the Secretary of State, was not made subject to conditions in other areas of US-Soviet relations, such as arms control.

The present long-term grain agreement betweeo the United States and the Soviet Union, which took effect in 1976 and will expire in September, provided for grain sales valued at more than $9.5 billion (£6 billioo).

Mr Lyng told a press conference that the United States wanted to sell more grain to the Soviet Union, the world's largest importer, under a new agreement.

He said that the United States had no target amounts in mind for a new agreement, but added: "We have said before that we would appreciate an opportunity to have those figures increased . . . we have grain to sell."

He said that at one time the US had supplied as much as 70 per cent of the Soviet Unioo's grain imports. After the 16-month grain embargo imposed in 1980 over Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, the US share of imports has dropped to "the low 20s".

Consultations between US and Soviet representatives had been tentatively planned for Londoo next month to discuss the remaining months of the current agreement and plans to cut back US production. But r Lyng said that meeting could be opened up to lay plans for negotiations towards a new agreement.

Mr William Brock, the US trade representative, to begin the negotiations.

Defiant Cape squatters arrested in dawn raid

From Michael Hornsby, Johannesburg

South African police arrested scores of "illegal" black squatters outside Cape Town early yesterday after firing dozens of tear gas canisters into a crowd of about 300 blacks and whites who refused to disperse.

Mrs Thozama Ncitha, six mooths pregnant, was taken unconscious to Grrote Schuur Hospital, and several babies were treated for the effects of tear gas. Mrs Ncitha was later said to be satisfactory.

There has been something like a running battle between police and blacks at the squatter camp oo the edge of the Guguletu township since February. Last week the police seized all the squatters' possessions including blankets and medicines for sick children. They theo mounted a round-the-clock watch to ensure that the squatters did not return to rebuild their flimsy shelters.

The squatters crept back, however. "Our clothes, food, cooked and uncooked, and medicines were taken away. But we are prepared to face anything, eveo death. We are citizens of this country, we will not move", one of them told white sympathisers.

On Mooday night, police reinforcements arrived and set about building a barbed-wire fence around the camp to prevent further infiltration. About 200 squatters had earlier been given permissioo to stay in the Cape Town area, but about 200 "illegals" remained at the site.

They were joined about 150 whites who had been attending a meeting of an organization that seeks to bring together women of different races.

THE ARTS

Opera: John Higgins visits La Belle Hélène at the Opéra Comique in Paris, and Christopher Warman reports on Covent Garden's plans for 1983-84

Two good showmen in delicious accord

Last Christmas at Geneva Jérome Savary staged a Périchole that turned out to be a whirlwind of colour and vitality. It was reported on this page at the time. Now he is back in Paris, home of his company Le Grand Magie Circus, with an earlier Offenbach, La Belle Hélène, which is cramming the Opéra Comique.

Savary and Offenbach go together much as Möet and Chandon. When they are twinned they fizz. In a mildly tongue-in-cheek note in the Opéra's monthly magazine Savary claims that if operetta is to succeed – a rather more difficult operation than putting on grand opera in his view – then "Il y faut du 'pep' ". He adds that he is all against unemployment, so for the past three years he has never employed a cast of fewer than 40.

True to his word, Savary provides pep and bodies in abundance. He keeps his cast on the go the whole time, turning double somersaults, dancing the can-can to show off underskirts made of the tricolor and even swimming in the sea at Nauplion in a feat of visual chicanery. Savary's company splits sharply in two: the young and beautiful (Helen, Paris, their attendant nymphets and accompanying androgynous swains) and the middle-aged and ridiculous (Agamemnon, Menelaus and Calchas). In the final act at Nauplion, the especial triumph of the production, it is as if the Club Méditerrané has been invaded by a tour operator specializing in the Darbys and Joans.

Savary is not a man bent on pleasing the purists. He tosses in topical jokes: the Mitterand austerity regime receives several a passing thwack. He delights in mild outrage: there is a female dwarf who sounds as if she answers to the name of Iphigénie. If the right singer is not available for the role then he will pillage the straight theatre: Jacques Sereys of the Comédie Française, a beaky-nosed comedian somewhat in the mould of Jacques Charon, is a joy as Menelaus, topped in a bowler hat and tailed in the pleated skirt of the evzone. Should a defence be needed then Savary would doubtless claim that he is a showman and probably go on to point out that Offenbach was one also. Opponents might point out that Meilhac and Halevy included a line or two of classical Greek in their couplets.

Sereys appears in all performances, but some of the other roles are double and even triple cast. Susan Daniel, a British mezzo who has been working in Basle and Munich, has all the physical allure for the title part; she pours into her sheath dress and carries an ostrich plume well. But the voice is less voluptuous than the body – "Dis-moi, Vénus" could have done with a little more sensuality of tone.

Similarly Michael Cousin's Paris needed a touch more vocal grace in numbers such as "Au mont Ida", but he is a skilled comedian and a fearless singer; moreover, he can wear a leopard skin without embarassment, an accomplishment not given to all tenors.

The core of Savary's production is provided by three expert and experienced Offenbach hands: Jules Bastin (Agamemnon), Michel Trempont (Calchas) and Michel Hamel (Achilles), who know just how to send up a Handelian chorus or take Wagner a little less than seriously. It is the art of exaggeration, so that if the Agamemnon has a spare tyre of his own around the belly then make sure to provide him with another inner tube for taking the waters at Nauplion. Bastin carries both oobly.

Not exactly the view of the Trojan Wars taken by Jean Giraudoux in La Guerre de Troie at our own National Theatre at the moment? Well, no, but a very Parisian and some would say rather wittier one, crisply conducted by Claude Schnitzler, who has taken over the orchestra from Alain Lombard this month. And for Offenbach himself a postscript of thanks: at one point he considered adding Homer to the cast list, described as "The Man from The Times", but fortunately he thought better of it.

● Remaining performances, with cast changes: tomorrow, May 23, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 31.

Television

Waxen history

"You've seen one too many men die", the young hero is told. "I don't know how you made it this far." After some six hours of The Blue and the Gray (BBC1), none of us did. The spectacle of all those false beards – quite apart from the amputations, burnings and general carnage – was enough to make the stoutest heart quail: Sunday evening faded into Monday, and it was not until the dark hours of Tuesday that the obligatory "upbeat" ending arrived to persuade us that the Americans are, after all, one big happy family.

Their view of history is of some large House of Wax, but that particular commodity was smeared on so thickly that it was difficult to tell Gettysburg from Appomattox, Lloyd Bridges from Stacy Keach. In fact the combatants spent so much time reassuring each other that they were all fellow Americans ("Get your heads down, Rebs, we're opening up!") that the differences hardly mattered. The action was so slow, however, that those of an enquiring mind would have found time to read a three-volume history of the Civil War in the intervals between various tearful reconciliations.

Since The Blue and the Gray was as far removed from American history as the Muppets are from the animal kingdom, the war itself seemed a peculiarly futile business – a series of melodramatic tableaux in which the major interest was in the number of dead men and horses that could be crowded into the smallest possible space. The excessive interest in the varieties of death and injury made some of the scenes difficult to watch, and the bombast from men in stovepipe hats did not disguise the prurience of the whole enterprise. It was significant, perhaps, that the central character, John Geyser, was a newspaper illustrator, adding a new horror to death with his ugly sketches for Harper's magazine. The drama itself, with this fascination for violence compounded by a crude sentimentality about fraternity and "one nation", was not a pretty sight.

Anthony Masters introduces the work of Joseph Chaikin, whose Trio opens at Riverside tonight

Chaikin: openly creative

Among the established innovators of American experimental theatre Joseph Chaikin's name commands unique respect and affection. A youthfully curly 47-year-old of great modesty, sweetness and quietness, he appeared with the Judith Malina/Julian Beck Living Theater for four years before leaving in 1963 to found the Open Theater, whose productions of Jean-Claude van Itallie's American Hurrah (1967) and Nightwalk (1973) played here at the Royal Court and the Round House respectively. From tonight until Sunday his "chamber theatre piece" Trio visits Riverside Studios, where he appeared two years ago in a one-man Samuel Beckett adaptation, Texts.

Trio is of special interest because its genesis as a collaborative "laboratory piece" marks, to some extent, a fresh exploration of the open creative techniques for which he is known (the last few years have been devoted to what he calls "ad hoc" productions, including classics, collaborations with Sam Shepard and work as a performer). Trio has its roots in recent work at the LaMama Winter Project, using several members of the Open Theater. "But there were pressures inhibiting the idea's development. Everybody was doing other work simultaneously; we also had to come up with productions by a set date and, because of time, certain explorations sometimes had to be cut off. In the process of discovery you can't always go straight; often things have to be peeled away, unearthed. Now we have explored further and Trio includes completely new material."

The three players in Trio include Ronnie Gilbert and Harry Mann, whose musical contribution is "not within, but mainly, jazz". "In the creative process, actors each bring individual things; there is no set pattern. The actor must not only be accomplished in a great range of histrionic resources; he must generate."

Subtitled "Lies and Secrets", Trio is "not a thesis piece, but a chamber piece composed like music". The theme is alluded to and worked out, as a musician would say, with relation to theatre itself (being a matter of artifice, disguise and revelation), glancing references to Beckett and Chekhov, and, most importantly, "lies and secrets" on a public scale.

Religion's secrets suggested the figures of a missionary couple, with their promises of salvation and threats of hell. The Psalms, with what Chaikin describes as their "bargaining" with and "bribery" towards Jehovah, are used to contribute in their vibrant, often bloodthirsty language ("with very few exceptions they end in a war cry"), a counterweight to Trio's predominantly "delicate, not aggressive" character. But in this age, as Chaikin sees it, the subtitle also takes on a political relevance. The reference to the nuclear threat is made explicit. A character asks: Since, in the Bomb, we now have something arguably equal to God, could it be God himself returning in different guise? Messiaen's quartet suggests what Chaikin's piece, for all its intimacy, tenderness and even comedy, might have had as a second subtitle: "Trio pour la fin du temps".

Courageous array of new productions

The Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, is to mount seven new opera productions in its 1983-84 season, including a double bill of Ravel's L'Enfant et les sortilèges, receiving its first performance in the house, and Stravinsky's The Nightingale, last heard at Covent Garden in Beecham's winter season of 1919. They will mark the opening in September this year of the Ravel-Varèse Festival, organized by the London Sinfonietta, and both will be produced by John Dexter and designed by David Hockney, the team who first presented them at the Met in New York.

The seven new productions, some of them borrowed from other houses, compare with only two new productions during the present season. At a press conference yesterday to announce the programme Sir Claus Moser, the Chairman, acknowledged that Covent Garden faces its most difficult financial situation, but added: "After two or three lean years we all felt we simply must get back to a more satisfactory level of new productions, which are the lifeblood of an opera house."

Some had been borrowed at very low cost, and not all were full-scale new productions, but he hoped they would give the public "some new experiences on the sort of budget we have". He said that they did not yet know the grant they would receive from the Arts Council next year but, if the worst predictions proved correct, Covent Garden would face a deficit of up to £800,000.

There are three totally new productions. Boris Godunov by Mussorgsky will be conducted by Claudio Abbado, the title role being sung for the first time by Robert Lloyd. The producer and designer will be announced next month.

Bellini's I Capuletti ed I Montecchi, which has not been presented at Covent Garden since 1848, will be conducted by Riccardo Muti and produced and designed by Pier Luigi Pizzi. In June 1984 Aida returns to Covent Garden after an absence of seven years, conducted by Zubin Mehta with production and design by Jean-Pierre Ponnelle. The cast includes Luciano Pavarotti, who recently cancelled his scheduled performances in Tosca at Covent Garden, and Katia Ricciarelli as Aida.

There is to be a production new to Britain of Massenet's Esclarmonde, never before performed at Covent Garden, with Joan Sutherland in the title role – her last new role with the Royal Opera. This production, originally presented by San Francisco Opera, is the first at Covent Garden by Lotfi Mansouri. Giordano's Andrea Chénier will be given in a production from the Cologne Opera which opens in Germany later this month. In London it will be conducted by Richard Armstrong with a cast led by José Carreras and Rosalind Plowright.

The programme will also include 13 revivals, among them Die Fledermaus with Placido Domingo making his house debut as conductor, and Berg's Lulu and Wozzeck.

Overwhelming 'love'

Liza Minnelli
Apollo Victoria

Unlike other star performers who have filled London's most cavernous houses with rapturous fans, Liza Minnelli is not so much electrifying as electrified. That slight figure, all elbows and knees and prominent teeth, seems designed for insignificance, but once she gets going it is as if someone has thrown a master-switch.

It is not simply that she is giving her all, but that she has been plugged into some outside power source, making her limbs pulse, her voice soar and her jagged hair almost spring up in spikes. The obvious source is her 12-piece band, which functions as a generator, particularly when she matches her own brazen vocal equipment against its six-strong brass section.

The same pattern recurs again and again: there is Minnelli as an urchin waif confronting the world with a wide-eyed gaze as some whispered appeal trembles on her lips; then the boys get blowing and this fragile figure changes into a striding, masterful goddess, flooding the building with a song of success.

She talks but little with the house, and the only revelation she offered on Monday was that her favourite form of music is "the old English folk ballad" (a likely story). Otherwise it is only to introduce the next number, or lead into a medley from her father's films, or her own performance in Cabaret.

One part of her appeal is that she is volcanically energetic without the least sign of aggression; another that she overflows with comradely warmth towards her musicians and co-dancers (David Gibson and a piece of india-rubber dynamite called Jamie Torcellini).

What becomes wearing is the way in which every piece of material she touches (with the exception of a bitter Aznavour conversation number) is homogenized into the Minnelli success story. She comes on singing "Manana", and as she puts it over it means that something wonderful really is going to happen tomorrow. "God Bless the Child (that's got his own)" changes from a song of destitution, as it was for Billie Holiday, into yet another strident affirmation of coming out on top. The head jerks back at the end, the arm goes up in a victory salute, and you are left in no doubt that Minnelli has got her own.

Again, if she sings "September Song" it is sandwiched inside Brecht's song of Bilbao, as a melancholy middle-eight leading to a triumphant reprise.

Changing from a black trouser suit to an electric blue mini-sack, and finally into pink toreador pants for the second act acrobatics, she certainly raised the roof on Monday. But in doing so she left a few casualties behind. I thought Gretchen Cryer's "People Change" an indestructible song; but I reckoned without Minnelli's trumpets, and her readiness to sacrifice the lyrics as long as that word "love" came ringing through on top.

Harrowing but hopeful spiritual journey: Chistian Patey in L'Argent

Cannes Film Festival

Bresson's masterly vision of faith

After riots, tropical rains and the hazards of the blockhouse, as the new festival palace is unlovingly known, the luck of Cannes changed with the screening of Robert Bresson's L'Argent – a film, at last, that needs no extenuation or qualification. Bresson is 76, and for 40 years (or 50, if we take into account his lost first film of 1933, Affaires publiques) has pursued his individual and uncompromised path.

L'Argent is based on a story by Tolstoy, and the anecdote and moral are as deceptively simple as a classical legend. As Bresson summarizes it, "A small transgression provokes a vertiginous avalanche of evil, until the moment that the forces of good arrive". Two schoolboys pass off a forged bank note on a shopkeeper. The shopkeeper knowingly uses the note to pay the young man who delivers his heating oil. The young man – the first to use the note innocently – is arrested. The respectable shopkeeper has his respectable assistant perjure himself, and the young man is convicted. Pardoned, he nevertheless loses his job.

Now without any means of livelihood, he becomes a criminal in reality, and is imprisoned. His child dies, his wife abandons him and he retreats into private anger. On his release he revenges himself on society in an orgy of murder.

Lately Bresson has insistently referred to films as "cinematographe", which he defines as "a style of writing, using images and sounds". His style is one of austerity and ellipsis. He strips narrative, dialogue, settings and characters to their naked essentials, so that nothing distracts from the description of the spiritual journeyings of his people. His story tells of robbery, violence, half a dozen murders, but these things are never directly shown. The film's most shocking moment in terms of physical action is the breaking of a glass.

Since Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne, made in 1944, all Bresson's films have dealt with the same theme of the battle between predestination and will, and have concluded with the same belief in an ultimate spiritual grace. In this hero's ultimate repentance and confession, Bresson still sees a possibility of atonement to justify the unquenchable faith that "the forces of good" will always arrive. Bresson is a singular soul, and L'Argent is the twelth succesive masterwork in an incomparable career.

Profound understanding of Tippett

Lindsay Quartet
St John's/Radio 3

If all composers prefaced their printed scores with practical advice on performance, like Tippett in his Second String Quartet, how much easier life would be. When recording this work (and its two fellows) a few years ago, the Lindsay Quartet were still luckier in having the composer in person as their mentor. So we can safely assume that what they told us about this second quartet at St John's on Monday was uncommonly close to the truth.

Their tempo for the slow movement was marginally slower than the prescribed Andante. But the greater expressive intensity it elicited was wholly attuned to the music's dark spirit of foreboding (Tippett has confessed to jotting down the fugue subject during the Munich days of 1938). The dolce towards its end was poignantly bitter-sweet. Liquid phrasing and shading of each individual strand dissolved all bar-lines in the madrigal-inspired texture of the opening Allegro grazioso, as the composer intended. By keeping the more piquantly accented Scherzo much on its toes, the Lindsays also had plenty of bite and drive in reserve for the finale, designed by Tippett to carry the main dramatic weight. The movement's withdrawn ending was deeply expressive.

With its swift alternations of vehemence and calm, Beethoven's F minor Quartet, Op 95, was recently described (in the opening programme of their current Wigmore Hall Beethoven cycle) by the Lindsay Quartet's leader, echoing Mendelssohn before him, as the epitome of Beethoven. By maintaining tension in relaxation, they again surmounted all problems of integration, showing themselves able to take risks in high dudgeon without roughening of tone or ensemble. They were also finely in command of a daringly fast tempo in the finale's shimmering F major coda. But it was all they found beneath the deceptively simple surface of the Allegretto that haunts my memory.

Joan Chissell

Academy of London
Queen Elizabeth Hall

Sir Lennox Berkeley was at one of the main musical tributes to his recent eightieth birthday in Monday night's concert and, after an eloquent performance of his Violin Concerto, he had a warm embrace for Yehudi Menuhin, for whom it was written and who first played it at the 1961 Bath Festival.

Although it is fairly small in scale, in ensemble and in duration, it reflects an intensity of musical imagination which was expressively shared between the violinist and the Academy of London, conducted by Richard Stamp.

The central slow movement is among the nearest occasions Sir Lennox came to making use of a 12 note row, here as the outline for a passacaglia theme which affords rich tonal associations, as well as some poetic writing for the solo violin.

Mr Menuhin brought a touch of rapture to his playing both here and in the equally lyrical substance of the finale, maintaining a purposeful partnership with the orchestra that was only slightly displaced at the very end.

Two other works by Sir Lennox were also performed: his elegantly diverting Serenade for Strings of 1939, and the lovely Four Poems of Saint Theresa of Avila which have had less than their due since they were written for Kathleen Ferrier in 1947.

The soloist here was Meriel Dickinson, whose unforced tone and expressive character missed only the quality of ecstasy implied in the harmonies of voice and instruments, particularly in the searching setting of "Let mine eyes see Thee".

For Mozart's Symphony in G minor (No 40), Mr Stamp reverted to the original orchestration without clarinets, imparting a keener tone to the ensemble at the expense of some variety. He was evidently concerned to express the fierce intensity of this music, which he did with a firm sense of rhythm and emphasis, while the response of his 30 or so players was distinguished by disciplined attack, lively spirit and polished phrasing.

JUNE X 83 David Steel is the man who sells the Liberal-SDP Alliance, but he and his top advisers often leave their own party behind, as Ian Bradley and George Brock report in the final part of this special series

Conducting the one-man Steel band

David Steel's personality is the greatest single asset which the Liberal-SDP Alliance can mobilize for its election campaign. Whatever the rationalizations flowing from the meetings over Steel's or Roy Jenkins's precedeoce, position or prominence, the SDP leadership accepts the inevitable: Steel sells the Alliance.

Steel's pulling power has dictated the style of the campaign. A joint leaders cemmittee meeting on April 27 decided to eschew big, set-piece rallies and platform speeches in favour of the informal question-and-answer sessions which Steel launched in Glasgow. "We decided on this format", said one of those at the meeting, "because it is the one in which David excels."

Steel's poll ratings are a response to an unblemished, "stainless" image. Steel is also an exceptionally astute and ambitious politician pursuing a clearly viewed long-term goal with fixed determination. And behind the finely judged image is the small group of advisers who have laboured long to cultivate it. Its unquestioned leader is Steel's closest political confidant, Richard Holme, backed by a small coterie of specialists which, strikingly, does not include any of the party's senior hierarchy or of its MPs.

Most members of this group share Steel's view of his party's future, a view net shared hy all Liberals and which has reversed the strategy of Liberal leaders since the war. His predecessors advocated winning votes first and then working out what was to be done with them. Steel has worked out what he wants to do with his limited power: he has used, is using and will use it to form coalitions, combinations and alliances. With those he intends to win more votes.

The Steel group trace their priorities to the day in February 1974 when Jeremy Thorpe discussed coalition with a stubborn Edward Heath, who was hanging on for a last few days in Downing Street. Steel was then the Liberal Chief Whip. He realized that such an alliance was unlikely for many reasons, but he also saw that, had the prospects been better, Thorpe had little idea of what to hargain for. There was no plan.

"Many of the self-styled social democrats would be happier company in comhination with Liberals than socialists," he wrote in 1975, a year before he replaced Thorpe as leader. "Should such an opportunity for an effective grouping of the left come about, it is important that the Liberal Party should not behave like a more rigid sect of the Exclusive Brethren, hut be ready to join with others in the more effective promotion of liberalism."

The effective promotion of the Steel strategy moved from the temporary pact with James Callaghan to a key role in encouragiog the foundation of the SDP, which included discouraging any thoughts among the Labour disaffected that they should join the Liberals instead. The vociferous opposition of long-time Liberal activists was ignored. One senior and well-respected Liberal observed: "I suppose you could say that what he's done since 1976 is to give the party a series of shocks which may seem good in the long term but certainly didn't seem good in the short term."

Steel's advisers are men he feels comfortable with. He is a reserved man, with few close friends and none of the taste for flamboyant London life which Thorpe displayed. The Steel advisers do not, of course, include any Therpe advisers.

Most influeotial of all is Helme. He and Steel met when they were both Liberal by-election candidates in 1965 (Steel for Roxburgh, Selkirk and Peebles and Holme for East Grinstead) and have been close friends since. Holme is a graduate of the Harvard Business School and former marketing director of Penguin books: he became Steel's chief political confidant after a spell in the United States during which he organized George McGovern's presidential campaign in Southern California. The experience shows in today's approach: he is an advocate of making as much of Steel's personality as possihle, on the grounds that voters respond to people and not abstractions. On Holme's advice, the Steel image has been toughened up since the Falklands. In the words of one adviser: "We took the decision that British politics was becoming rougher and that we needed to reveal David as a tough guy. It is part of him that has always been there, hut it has not really been projected in the past." Holme is almost the only other member of the Liberal Party Steel trusts to enter important negotiations with the SDP with full powers of decision.

He sees Steel three or four times a week, supplying suggestions and drafts for speeches, particularly on constitutional, ecological and defence issues. He is credited with most of the jokes in Steel's speeches, although no one could claim the Liberal leader as a great knockahout turn. Holme had Steel describing Mrs Thatcher as the "Enid Blyton of economics" and Michael Foot and Roy Hattersley as "Steptoe and Son". During the 1979 election campaign, Holme was at Steel's Dolphin Square flat at 7.15 each morning for a daily session with the morning papers and to plan the tactics of the day.

Liberal party political broadcasts will be produced – as in 1979 – by a freelance television director, Justin Cartwright. His 1979 films made much of Steel and particularly tried to build the personal and human side of the politician. A special studio set was constructed to represent the sitting room of the Steel family home at Ettrick Bridge in the Borders and there was film of Steel playing with his children and walking in the Scottish hills.

There was nothing inaccurate about such images: Steel puts in a great deal of travelling in order to try to be at Ettrick Bridge three weekends out of four. But he is also fascinated by the medium of television and by the mechanics of its production. One adviser says he would have been an excellent director if he had not become a politician, and before entering politics full-time he was indeed briefly a presenter on BBC Scotland. He is a fan of new technology. He was impressed by the speech projection machine used by Ronald Reagan when he addressed both houses of Parliament last year, and used one himself when he spoke at the Alliance rally in January.

Several of Steel's advisers feel that, good as he is on television, the party's exposure is now reaching proportions where more high-powered inside knowledge would help. Or, as one of them put it, "No politician getting decent communications advice would be allowed on television in those shirts with the collar a different colour from the rest of it."

Yet on television Steel manages a number of fine balances: he is open without being indiscreet, undogmatic without being waffly. He is unfailingly polite into the bargain.

There is one important component in these performances which cannot be tuned or packaged: his moral commitment. The son of the manse has embraced a Liberalism which is explicitly Christian and moral as well as political, and those close to Steel are in no doubt that his clear and deeply held religious views influence the speed and clarity with which he will answer questions likely to make other politicians wriggle and prevaricate.

Those moral commitments and his strategy for the party rank as priorities for Steel and his inner group well ahead of any actual Liberal policy prescriptions. "I don't think he knows what half of them are," one member said of the party's manifesto commitments. It is this frame of mind which has so far smoothed the path of Alliance seat allocation and policy negotiation.

Steel is impatient with Liberals who want to liberalize the world on paper before they have any power to make the ideas real. He is content for the Liberals' public image to remain an association with general ideas for the time being – a party which has not been in power in recent memory is unlikely to catch extra votes by spelling out the legislative timetable for revolutionizing the Rate Snpport Grant.

Although Steel himself is not naturally interested in Liberal philosophy, he accepts the need for an occasional heavyweight speech. For these he turns to William Wallace, an old fashioned Liberal in the Gladstone tradition. Wallace's contributions are often filtered through Holme, who may not have Wallace's academic background but who does have more of Steel's ear.

Wallace and Holme normally supply the foundation for Steel's speech to the annual party assembly, meeting during July at the Albert puh in Victoria Street for their first session: Holme usually spends a few days at Ettrick Bridge in early August producing a first draft.

Most smaller-scale Steel speeches will be coordinated or drafted by his personal assistant, Stuart Mole.

There have been prohlems over finding speechwriters for the campaign. Holme will be fighting a strong Liberal prospect in Cheltenham, Mole will be making his fourth attempt to unseat Norman St John Stevas in Chelmsford, Wallace will be fighting Shipley. Suggestions and scripts are not hard to come by, but just before the election announcement, the team were still casting around for a "wordsman" with whom Steel felt happy.

In place of Holme, Steel will have as his travelling companion on the campaign Lord (Pratap) Chitnis, once Liberal agent at the famous 1962 Orpington by-election, subsequently head of the party's organization and one of Jeremy Thorpe's most implacable enemies. He is now director of the Joseph Rowntree Social Service Trust based in York. A staunch Roman Catholic, he is credited with an "almost Jesuitical" influence over the Presbyterian Steel.

The other two members of the triumvirate planning the Steel campaign trail are Paul Tyler, ex-MP for Bodmin and now on the staff of the public relations consultancy Good Relations, and Andrew Gifford, Steel's personal assistant for four years and now a parliamentary lobbyist.

Tyler will be based in London throughout the campaign and will specalize in media arrangements. Gifford, the junior member of the trio, has charge of logistics and transport. In 1979, Steel travelled most of the campaign in the party "battlehus". This time, symbolically, he will be moving faster some of the time, by both jet and helicopter. Twenty hours of flying time in each have been promised by sympathetic benefactors.

No senior figures in the party hierarchy or any of its MPs are members of the Steel band. Holme was party president for a year, but otherwise Steel has chosen his people in a way that reflects his determination to take the party the way he wants it to go. He not only takes little notice of what the parliamentary party thinks, but operates at some distance from it. The business of "managing" the MPs and the party at large is in the hands of two veteran party men, Lords Tordoff and Evans, who form a huffer state between the leader and his party.

There is perhaps one other member of the inner group who might be consulted on such questions: Judy Steel. Steel's friends rate her as an important influence, especially, as nne put it, "in telling him when he's doing something silly". Steel is not, however, prone to silliness. He is not even prone to untidiness. The self-containment means that however compatible and trusted his inner advisers are, in the end he takes advice from no one but himself. He may use the technical skills which his group provides, but he is also the man who could manage without them if he had to.

Travelling companions

The leadership of the Alliance will create a joint election office at the SDP headquarters in Cowley Street, which will be headed by John Lyttle, normally the head of Roy Jenkins's Westminster office. Its staff will be a mixture of Liberals and Social Democrats.

Jenkins himself will be accompanied by a three-strong team on his ambitious forays away from Hillhead. He will be rejoined by his ex-personal assistant, Lord Harris, for the duration of his travels. Harris's inclusion in the team was accompanied by a certain vagueness at SDP headquarters about exactly what he would be doing. Caroline Thomson, a former BBC journalist who works in Jenkins's private office, and his secretary, Celia Beale, complete the team. Mrs Jennifer Jenkins will, as usual, campaign with her husband.

Jenkins's principal speechwriters are likely to be Lyttle, Thomson and Christopher Smallwood, the ex-Treasury civil servant who coordinates SDP policy-making.

SPECIAL DEVELOPMENT AREA

Float along with me

MOREOVER . . . Miles Kington

At this confusing time I have been asked to provide a short glossary of the political terms involved in a general election to help the floating voter.

Floating Voter: One who cannot quite make up his mind whether Mrs Thatcher's policies have nearly destroyed the industrial and social fabric of the country or whether they have put it firmly back on a stable footing.

General Election: A day on which more than 600 by-elections are held all at the same time, in order to keep Screaming Lord Sutch's appearances down to a minimum.

Alliance: An unofficial agreement between the Tory and Labour parties to help to destroy the SDP and Liberals.

Manifesto: 1. A political document issued by a party for its adherents to read, but which is only studied by its opponents to provide ammunition. 2. A series ef promises broken at the last election. 3. A device for keeping the Labour Party together. 4. Something which everyone talks about but no one has ever seen.

Hustings: One of the Cinque Ports constituencies, along with Dole, Marplan, Boakes and Heseltine.

Old Labour Party: A term devised by the Tories to suggest that the Labour Party now caters only for those who grow leeks for competition, play in brass bands and refer to themselves as socialists.

Old Tory Party: Term devised by the Labour Party to suggest that the Conservative Party is controlled by people who would not dream of meeting Mrs Thatcher socially.

Caucus: Any group to which the speaker does not have access.

Ecological: An abhorrent and unEnglish pretence that there are some matters too important to play party politics with.

Poll: 1. General election: an opportunity for the public to vote against the party of their choice. 2. A daily sounding ef public opinion to maintain interest in an election and to sell newspapers. 3. A survey which claims to show what voters are thinking but which succeeds only in changing their minds.

Proportional Representation: 1. The strange habit of the French of holding an election in two parts en consecutive Sundays. 2. An electoral system which would bring the Liberal/SDP alliance to power, but which can only be established if the Liberals and SDP are already in power.

Idealism: A vague feeling that there must be a way of having David Steel as Prime Minister witheut actually putting the Liberals in power.

Swing: Something which, if repeated all over the country, would produce a certain result, but never does; a process only understood by Professor Ivor Crewe.

Secret Ballot: A kind of election in which nobody can find out how you voted. There are many countries which do not have a secret ballot, such as Russia, Albania and Great Britain. Well, perhaps Russia and Albania do, but in Great Britain each ballot paper is numbered so that it can be checked, if necessary, against your name and address.

WEDNESDAY PAGE

JOANNA LUMLEY'S DIARY

Exit, stage left, moved to tears

The dress rehearsal was at two o'clock on Tuesday. We stepped for the first time on to our little black and silver stage, dressed to the nines in our sumptuous evening clothes. We have no costume changes, no scenery to shift, no props, apart from champagne glasses and cigarettes, to fumble with or break. We shimmered along in front of the empty seats; we knew our lines and our songs, all our moves and dance steps. After the first act, we stopped for coffee; bright, brittle smiles hid the fluttering panic – my stomach felt as though cows were being herded through it. In the second act, after the extract from Brief Encounter, Simon and I moved the two black, semi-circular seats together again to form a single bench. Bossiness, always my undoing, made his entrance.

My mouth opened and, in a voice an octave higher than my own, I said, "They go further upstage, Simon – move it upstage". I picked up my bit of beneb and plonked it down an unnecessary two inches to the left. At that moment a disc slipped in my neck. Suddenly and quite smoothly, I turned from Gertrude Lawrence into Richard III. My head moved neither to left nor right, neither up, nor down. My shoulder, in a ghastly spasm, rose up level with my ear and my left hand became an uninbabited rubber glove. It was now ten past five, and our first show in front of the paying public was to be at eight o'clock sharp.

Oh! the agony and terror! The confusion and despair! I lay face down on the dressing room floor, nose pressed against the carpet, while Ken, the choreographer, and Gill, the singing Gertie, kneaded and pummelled and rubbed, desperately trying to loosen the Laocoon knot. Sheridan Morley packed me into his car and we sped down to see a Bone Man. Bone Man wearily pushed a big needle full of anaesthetic into my shoulder blade and, I'm ashamed to say, fat tears rolled down my painted face.

I chewed up several pain killers of one sort and some others of another, and realized, as I was winched into my dress again, that part of my brain had downed tools in sympathy. Of course, it was far, far worse for my beloved fellow performers. I only had to concentrate on staying upright – they had to make the show fun. How we did it, or how the show went, I'll never know; but the actors' medic, Doctor Theatre, stepped in: he forces so much adrenalin round your body that pain evaporates, even enabling ballerinas to dance on broken ankles. We had to cancel the next two shows and, for me, the next two days of filming a commercial. Moral: don't put your daughter on the stage, Mrs Worthington; but if you do, get someone else to move the furniture.

The cleanest people in the world are not surgeons and nurses scrubbed up for the operating theatre: they are actors just before they go onstage, particularly if four men and two women have to share a room slightly smaller than a bus shelter. Cleanliness must be contagious; you have never seen such constant ablutions. A good deal of baby powder floats about and deodorants are sprayed and rolled on to every conceivable limb and cranny. Nostrils and beards and ears are inspected, with scissors flying to and fro; gargling and vigorous tooth brushings are followed by tongue numbing blasts of breath sweeteners and throat tablets. Wigs are adjusted and snipped, fingernails pared and a great deal of hand washing goes on. The scent and aftershave clash mistily round the mirrors, some hair spray and one more gasp of Breathblitz before the monkey plucking starts. Specks of dust and fluff, odd hairs and so forth are beadily tracked down and picked off like ticks while our lips move endlessly in exercises – "Pataka, pataka, budega, budega, pappalakka poo, oigger diggerdi". Thank God we don't do matinees.

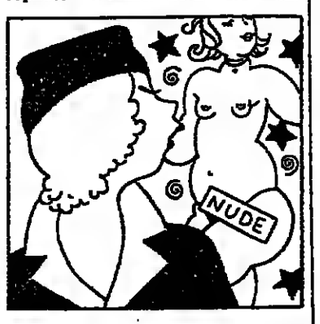
Sped off to do the David Frost Live from London show at the studios in Wandsworth. What a line-up! Petula Clark and Nigel Dempster, Angela Rippon and Willie Hamilton, Robert Lacey and Danny La Rue, Jim Davidson and the wondrous Boy George and Culture Club. This is the sixth of 13 shows which are transmitted live to Australia's East Coast, leaving us at 11.30 am and popping up simultaneously at 8.30 pm down-under time. Why on earth haven't we got a show like this in Britain? Frost was in his element, there is a lively, warm-hearted audience and a wonderful mix-up of musicians and personalities. Lucky old Oz.

Incidentally, what has happened to all the splendid drama serials here at home? Where is the night every week when everyone stays in for fear of missing the next great episode and talk is of nothing else the next day? (except Coronation Street, of course: everyone sensible watches that). Enforced leisure is the big new boy in town; entertainment is the dame on his arm. We should all be on our toes.

More just opened an envelope and unravelled a large sepia photograph of myself. At least I thought it was me, looking particularly good, until I turned it round the right way and found it was Julie Christie. When I went to Greece in 1966, Dr Zhivago had just come out, and the Greek boys on the island were determined that I was this lovely girl. "Jooly Kreestee", they yelled. "You Jooly Kreesty". I couldn't convince them that I wasn't, so I signed all their bits of paper with a flourish. I shall go to the exhibition of Martyn Goddard's work at the National Theatre which the photograph advertises, if only in the hope of meeting and seeing the real Julie Christie for who I was so happily mistaken.

Leaving L'Escargot after lunch, I stepped out on to the Soho pavement and sniffed the sunny air. I had 10 minutes to kill before recording a voice-over round the corner. Two lads came by. "Wotcher Purdey", said one "doin" any more Avengers then?" "No, sadly not", I replied. "Wotcher doin' 'ere then.



Purdey?" "I'm working here", I said. "Gaw", said the other, and they hastened away. Turning round, I saw I was standing in front of a non-stop, 24-hour, extremely vulgar, all bits showing strip club.

I was addressing an audience of fairly young children at the Screen on the Hill before their Saturday morning film show. "And now", I said "how do you think I was able to turn my eyes blue in Sapphire and Steel" A small boy in the front row answered: "Double glazing."

Government policy and marriage rifts

I wonder how much legislation and official policy influences the course of events in the break-up of a marriage which has for the most part been happy, without sexual difficulties, and produced children who are successful, happily married, and have children of their own. It is hard for a woman to contemplate divorce after 40 years of marriage, and to see another woman take her name, and slip into her place, eat from her table, and, worst of all, take possession of the kitchen so carefully planned by her that hands move automatically from one working area to another. Only in the mind's eye does one see it, of course.

I have never been back, and from the moment we kissed goodbye, my husband never wanted to see me again. He wanted to be alone, he said but he had always had his girlfriends, and I had kept out of the way rather than upset myself. Because we had built up a business together after he had taken redundancy, I had to be the one to move out, but in my new home a hundred miles away, I tried not to think of what I had left behind, to have things as I wanted it this time, and be happy with new friends.

This I shall be, but the financial difficulty of starting out on one's own in 1979/80 can only be compared with putting in oil-fired central heating in 1973/74, and I had that too! The enormous increase of mortgage rates at that time, and the not inconsiderable increase in the rates, electricity and telephone left practically nothing – even for food.

But as the poor woman struggles out from beneath the burden of her problems in the first years of separation, gets the house weatherproof, the weeds under control so the vegetables grow and finds to her joy that interest rates are coming down, the husband decides that living on his own, despite a woman coming in to clean, is not as marvellous as he thought. So he writes to his wife to say he would like divorce as he wants to re-marry. The incentive is not a lump sum as a sweetener, but the fact that a woman over 60 can get a full Old Age Pension, a bit of government policy that I suspect is not very well known.

At 60 I am now entitled to £8.86 a week (and God knows how that is calculated) so I have enough to feed myself, but the full pension of over £30 which I should get if I allowed my husband to divorce me is too strong a temptation. I could buy new clothes, have a holiday, pay someone to do digging or painting – or just pay off my debts. But why should I be put into this position of deciding to break up a 40-year-old marriage, (when in old age we might have come together again) because of some administrative decision that legal separation is one thing divorce quite another? The advantage to me is that a pension rises with inflation, whereas my allowance did not. For my husband, the advantage is greater: he can marry a woman 20 years younger before he is 70, and while she will still have him, and he does not have to worry about the possibility of looking after an old woman crippled with arthritis and going deaf – but that was always an excuse for silence.

The question remains. Am I doing my husband a favour by granting divorce "early" so that he can rush into another marriage which may well not last because of incompatibility or the vast difference in age. How long will a woman under 50 stay with an old man? Once she has got his money, she can leave (or turn him out) and marry again. All the penny-pinching over the years which has bought a lovely home and given children a good start in life, may just provide for a woman I have never met, and be acquired later by a new husband. As my solicitor tells me, all the money we have saved over the years could go to this man and his children and neither our children nor those of my husband's new wife would benefit at all.

I have promised now to make no demands for myself, but I am trying to get something for my children by begging my husband to make a will which gives money to his future wife for her lifetime only, but leaves his property for our children, and our children's children. I never contemplated dragging him through the courts so that we would both be penniless, but are government regulations causing me to do something for a mere £30 or so per week, and is it in the interests of the country as a whole that this should happen?

My three boys came from the hard-to-place bracket

FIRST PERSON

How do children who are adopted into a racially mixed family cope with the extra pressure put on them? I am white, single, old (52) compared to most adopters, and earn considerably less than I would receive if content to draw supplementary benefit – on face value not an ideal candidate for proxy parenthood. My little family of three boys all emanated from that "hard-to-place" bracket in which so many unconventional infants find themselves... David (15, Anglo-Negro); Andrew (10, Negro) and Simon (5, Anglo-Saxon). Had young married couples with iron stamina and bottomless wells of love and patience "put in" for any one of these boys I wouldn't – quite rightly – have stood an earthly chance of adopting them.

The British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering are currently urging local authorities to ensure wherever possible that black children are adopted by black families. With the long-standing stress on "matching" however, this has surely always been the case. The problem is that you can't squeeze a quart, as ever, into a pint pot. There are more coloured children needing homes than there are coloured couples wanting to adopt. Disinclined couples cannot be press-ganged into taking an infant – nor should they be.

Colour was the adoption "disability" concerning David and Andrew, mental and emotional aberration in the case of Simon. All were well past babyhood when they joined this one-sided family; all presented problems which could be put down to some form of "institutionalization"; all, with time and care, settled in with comfortable happiness and learned both to accept love and to give it.

We live in a village where there are no other coloured people. At school, in the local town, the boys share their distinction with no more than three or four others. Teasing in a mild form occasionally mars their horizons: but no more than if their hair were orange, their ears outstanding or their feet attached d lo Charlie Chaplin. David once clouted a would be tormentor. He's built like a Harlem Globe trotter and is not one to be trifled with.

Andrew, on the other hand, capitalizes on his colour. In the days of nannies he'd have been called a "show-off" and is inclined to needle his peers until they snap. He then expects sympathy, and used, before I rumbled him, to get it. Now he's told to get on with it.

Only twice have I come across what might be seen as undiluted racial prejudice, and on both counts by people who knew nothing of our family, except that we were mixed. In the first instance it was the grandmother of some children who used to drop in to play. She made it plain to her daughter that she "didn't like it" – and of course the message got back to me. In the second it was a total stranger in a restaurant who talked loudly for all to hear about "the old pig and her black litter". The boys themselves never knew of the first slight – and the second incident were so concocted about me being called an "old pig" in that they missed the point of the "black litter" altogether.

Educationally, the boys are doing well. David has been reading anything and everything since the age of 4. Andrew plays the violin with verve and has a good ear. They show every outward sign of being secure, self-confident and "normal"; though they have their disagreements and squabbles. So, yes, by all means place black children with black families whenever possible; but don't lose sight of the value of mixed-race households. Don't lose sight, either, of older females of any colour who, in the absence of more suitable applicants, may be happy to start a late family.

TALKBACK

Planned pregnancy

From Dr Paul Maxon, Leeds, West Yorkshire

Thank you for publishing such an attractive article on pre-pregnancy care (May 4). Much as I would like to do so, I am unable to enter into correspondence with individual mothers-to-be as I can only investigate patients registered with my own practice. Instead I recommend:–

(1) Sending for the leaflet "Healthy Babies Begin Before You're Pregnant". 15p and a s.a.e. to The National Childbirth Trust (Leeds Branch), 8, Harlech Way, Garforth, Leeds, West Yorks.

(2) When you have read this, ask your general practitioner to deal with any problems which remain and ask for referral to a local obstetrician or genetic counselling service as appropriate. Dietitians in maternity units should be able to advise on individual food diaries.

I would urge all mothers-to-be to think about spacing their pregnancies and this includes allowing enough time to elapse after a miscarriage. Allow at least one year to elapse between the birth of one child and the conception of the next.

Western diets are infinitely various and as traditional food culture has broken down, many women and their families are now vulnerable. My own studies show that women on low incomes, working women and those belonging to recently-arrived racial minorities are often on very poor diets, lacking notably in calorie intake, "B" vitamins including folic acid, and vitamin "C" together with natural sources of zinc and iron.

Finally, may I appeal to your readers for information about sources of research funds to enable my work to continue into the advantages of pre-conception care in raising birthweights, reducing the incidence of disability and the liability to infection in infancy, which occurs in low birth weight babies.

Tune in to yourself

From Mrs Dora Nash, 43, Church Street, St. Albans, Hertfordshire

Ruth Winter, in her very interesting article about pre-conceptual care (May 4) makes the extraordinary statement that for eight weeks after conception, "a woman invariably does not realize she is pregnant." If this is indeed the case for many woman – and it was certainly not for me – perhaps this is because women today are taught to think more about methods of contraception than about their own fertility.

Anyone who uses a natural method of fertility control, and especially the Billings method, knows all the time what the state of her fertility is: whether she is infertile or fertile, whether she is ovulating or not, and how many days she has to go until menstruation. Someone who is tuned in to herself in this way – and is not, of course interfering with her body by means of drugs or devices – knows within a few weeks if she has conceived.

More to prunes than custard and sniggers

THE TIMES COOK

Shona Crawford Poole

It is a pity that to the British prunes are a joke by and large – socially acceptable only at the breakfast table and served, even there, with an air of regrettable necessity. Prunes and school humour have a lot to answer for.

The French, whose concern is for the health of their livers, treat prunes with the gastronomic respect they deserve. Spared stewed prunes and custard, they turn dried plums into all manner of decent puddings and pies. One of the most delectable sweet treats I know are billowing prunes stuffed with a rich prune cream. They are sold in smart navy and gold tins, cost a fortune and Fortnums stock them.

Prunes feature in many traditional European recipes for meat and game. The combination of pork and prunes is common from Spain to Poland in braises, stews and roasts. In the old Lancashire Wakes week chicken dish, Hindle Wakes, the prunes are relic of the taste for dried fruit and spices with meat, which was common in medieval England.

Loin of pork with prunes
Serves six to eight

- 225 g (8 oz) plump prunes
- 900 g (2 lbs) boneless loin of pork in one piece
- A small piece of green ginger, or 1 teaspoon ground ginger
- Salt and freshly ground black pepper
- 85 g (3 oz) butter
- 150 ml (¼ pint) dry white wine
- 300 ml (½ pint) light stock

Cover the prunes with cold tea or water and soak them until they are soft enough for the stones to be removed easily. Stone them.

Cut a lengthwise slit in the meat and fill it with the prunes. Stitch the slit shut, enclosing the prunes. Crush the ginger in a garlic press and rub it over the meat. Season it well.

Melt half the butter and brown the meat on all sides on top of the stove. Add the wine and cook on a fairly high heat until it has reduced by half, then add the stock and bring to the boil. Transfer the meat to a shallow baking dish and roast it in a preheated moderate oven (180°C/350°F, gas mark 4) for about 1½ hours, basting it several times. To check that the pork is cooked, pierce it with a skewer inserted into the thickest part: It is cooked when the juices run clear.

Transfer the meat to a serving dish to keep warm. Reduce the pan juices by fast boiling to about 120 ml/4 fl oz. Stir in the remaining butter, a little at a time, to thicken and shine the sauce. This works best if the butter is very cold.

Slice the meat and pour the sauce over it. Serve with plainly cooked potatoes or noodles and a green vegetable or salad.

A heavy, velvety purée of prunes was a souvenir from a recent trip to France. The preserve was sold as a jam and this home-made version, like the original, is very good on hot buttered toast or stirred into plain yogurt. It can also be used as a cake filling, or as a base for whole prunes in a flan or tart.

Prune preserve
Makes about 2 kilos (4½ lbs)

- 900g (2 lbs) prunes
- Juice of 2 lemons
- 900g (2 lbs) granulated or preserving sugar

Put the prunes in a preserving pan, or other large pan with the lemon juice and 1 litre (1¾ pints) water. Leave them to soak for an hour or two, or better still, overnight, then bring to the boil and simmer until they are tender. Cool the prunes, remove the stones and purée the fruit, with its cooking liquid, using a food processor or by working it through a mouli légumes or sieve. Return the purée to the pan and add the sugar. Stir on a low heat until the sugar has dissolved, then raise the heat and boil the preserve for five minutes. Pour it immediately into clean, dry, heated jars (10 minutes or more in a very cool oven 110°C/225°F, gas mark ¼). Seal immediately and store until needed in a cool, dark place.

Makes about 1 litre (1¾ pints)

- 450g (1lb) plump prunes
- Juice of 2 oranges
- 4 tablespoons honey or brown sugar
- 300ml (½ pint) double cream, chilled

Turn the freezer to its coldest setting. Put the prunes in a bowl with the orange juice and enough water or cold tea to cover them. Leave them to soak for an hour or two, or, better still, overnight. Simmer the prunes with their soaking liquid and the honey or brown sugar until they are very tender. When the prunes are cool enough to handle, remove the stones, then purée the fruit with the liquid in a food processor, or by working them through a mouli legumes or a sieve.

Whip the chilled cream with a tablespoon of iced water until it holds soft peaks. Combine it with the prune purée and turn the mixture into a serving dish or dishes. Cover and freeze until firm. Serve frozen prune mousse on its own or with a compote of dried fruit.

Variations on this recipe include a festive version of the mousse studded with small pieces of prune which have been soaked until soft in cognac or armagnac. A mixture of prunes and dried apricots also makes a delicious frozen mousse.

French country cooking has quite a selection of prune tarts and flans ranging from a simple batter pudding, far Breton, to more formal pieces of glazed patisserie. This excellent prune flan is a nice compromise between the two extremes.

Prune flan
Serves six to eight

- 450 g (1 lb) plump prunes
- For the pastry
- 225 g (8 oz) plain flour
- ¼ teaspoon salt
- 2 tablespoons caster sugar
- 110 g (4 oz) chilled butter
- Iced water to mix
- For the filling
- 1 large egg
- 150 ml (¼ pint) single cream
- 4 tablespoons sugar
- 1 tablespoon cornflour
- 2 tablespoons rum or cognac
- 30 g (1 oz) butter

Cover the prunes with water or cold tea and leave them to soak for an hour or two, or better still, overnight. Drain and stone them.

Sift the flour, salt and sugar into a bowl and add the butter cut in dice. Rub the fat into the flour and stir in enough iced water to make a firm dough. Rest the dough for at least 30 minutes before rolling it thinly on a lightly floured surface and using it to line a 25 cm (10 inch) loose-bottomed flan tin, preferably one which has fluted sides.

Bake the pastry shell, weighted with beans or rice, in a preheated hot oven (220°C/425°F, gas mark 7) for 10 minutes, then remove the weights, lower the heat to moderate (180°C/350°F, gas mark 4) and bake for 15 minutes more before filling.

Arrange the prunes over the base of the flan. Combine the egg, cream, sugar, cornflour and rum and mix well. Pour this mixture over the prunes and top with the butter cut in small dice. Return the flan to the oven and bake it for about another 40 minutes, or until the custard is firm. Serve hot, warm or cold. Warm is best.

Anti-hanging

My political free-thinker this morning is Joe Harvey of Surbiton. He is seeking election for his native Bodmin in Cornwall as candidate of the charmingly named Very Good Party. It is, you will readily understand, not related to any other party. Harvey's manifesto has some three dozen points. Number Two is: "To remove hanging objects from car windows so as to improve vision", which sounds the simple sort of task even a politician could manage.

Harvey would also reduce VAT to 10 per cent. "It's easier to calculate then", he reasons. He proposes a 30 per cent surcharge on Japanese imports and would construct the Channel Tunnel. "I have worked in tunnels. The French will do their half." He promises: "We will do something for the prostitutes of this country", but with political tact he does not specify what. "I've no enemies", Harvey says, though of course I am afraid that would change if he got elected.

Hot air time

The SDP-Alliance campaign office in Brighton, Kemptown has been having trouble with its telephone; now the candidate, Tom Burke, has been told by his friendly neighbourhood newsagent that all their calls can be heard on transistor radios. Since the newsagent's shop is directly opposite Labour headquarters, Burke was perturbed, but I do not think he needs to worry. I spoke to the Labour agent, W. J. Clarke, who told me: "We are here to work, laddie. If anybody came in distracting us with a transistor radio, I would sling him out."

Track record

Much has been made of Margaret Thatcher's well-known aversion to trains, perhaps too much. Though she will be flying United Biscuits on her campaign sorties, the Prime Minister has still to get to Gatwick before she can achieve lift-off, and there, I am reliably informed, it is the train that will take the strain. Perhaps this means the Gatwick line will be prime candidate for hiving off if she is reelected.

Street fighting

There is not much I can (or probably need to) do to help along the row about dirty tricks in the Conservative advertising campaign, but perhaps it is not too late to point out a technical foul in Central Office's advertisement which appeared in the Daily Mail on polling day for the local elections. It showed Hazelbourne Road, Clapham, one side of which is in Labour-controlled Lambeth, the other in Conservative-controlled Wandsworth. One side was labelled "Labour rates £604 a year", the other "Tory rates £392 a year". Since politicians can do so little right, it was probably inevitable that they got the sides of the road in the picture the wrong way round.

Lunshood

With the succession to the veteran Dutchman Joseph Luns as secretary-general of Nato still the subject of interminable speculation, the joke around Brussels is what Henry Kissinger once said: "The Netherlands have been independent for 400 years, and for most of that time Luns has been foreign minister."

Footing the bill

Remembering to drive on the right is the least of the problems faced by two London bus drivers in New York en route to Canada. Their vehicles, two old London double-deckers which have been sold by London Transport to Prince Edward Island, are 14ft 6in high, while many bridges in the five states they must cross have a clearance of only 13ft 6in. Each state has its own different system of permits and escort regulations, and the two drivers, Lionel Moss and John Warner, reckon the cost of expert guidance along a suitable route would be $2,500, a sum which LT is not prepared to pay. The harassed pair are rueing the day they decided not to deliver the buses by sea, but to take in the Britain Salutes New York festivities.

Alarming case

If anything bugs me it is the weight of junk that burdens my briefcase. So I am an unlikely customer for the Secret Connection briefcase. It is so full of anti-bugging devices there is scarcely room for anything else. It has a tape recorder detector, a bug detection system, a built-in scrambler for telephone privacy, a wireless telephone, a six-hour recorder, portable defence and communications systems, a bomb-sniffer to warn of hidden explosives and it is lined with bullet-proof fabric. There is also a siren to sound the alarm if someone picks up the lot and makes off with it.

Dr Micheil MacDonald, director of the Scottish Tartans Museum, is safely returned from the Scots in Sweden exhibition in Stockholm. I say safely because his foreign tours are not without awkward moments. In America a silver-haired lady fixed her gaze on his seventeenth century sporran and asked: "What exactly do you carry in your scrotum?" His reply was printable for all but reasons of length. It was a five-minute exposition of the word play between Latin, Greek and Gaelic for "seed-case" in biology and costume.

Cardowan: Labour puts its cards on the table

I could not have guessed that the argument at the heart of the election, the principle that defines both the nature of the contest and the irreducible difference between the Conservative and Labour parties, would be laid out, and in the starkest possible terms, not just in the first week of the campaign but on the very day that Parliament was dissolved. Yet so it has proved, and however far I stretch my imagination I cannot conjure up the picture of any domestic question that could rival, in its role as the Occam's Razor of the 1983 campaign, the events at Cardowan colliery.

When I say "the events", I am not referring to the fracas that took place at the pit after the announcement that it was to be closed: the manhandling of Mr Albert Wheeler and Mr John Loudon, National Coal Board director and deputy director for Scotland, was unpleasant, but the throwing of ice-creams and meat pies (apparently the favoured missiles), or even the breaking of Mr Loudoo's spectacles, does not suggest to me that the rough beast, its hour come round at last, is slouching towards Glasgow to be born. What interests me is the case made by the Coal Board for closing the pit, and the response to the Coal Board's arguments.

The pit has lost £39m in six years, and the rate of loss is increasing (it lost £8m last year and will lose £10m this year); the geology of the area makes it difficult to work, productivity is no more than two-fifths of the national coal-mining average (Mr Wheeler described this phenomenon, with somewhat less tact than the occasion seemed to call for, as "a lack of effort on the part of the men"), the mine is so full of gas that its local nickname is "the gasometer", and in case all that wasn't enough, the coal it produces in such small quantities and at such a cost is of a type that nobody anywhere wants to buy.

So much for economics; but economics, particularly during an election campaign, is not enough. What about humanity? What about Cardowan's 1,090 miners, thrown penniless out of work in a declining industry during a recession?

What indeed? It transpires that no miner is to be thrown penniless out of work. Those who choose can take redundancy payments, together with a pension starting now and continuing until they reach the normal retiring age and their normal pension; those who do not so choose are offered employment at one of three other pits, and up to £1,500 for the disturbance of the move.

The Conservative minister into whose province the matter falls has refused to intervene to reverse the Coal Board's decision. But the Labour shadow minister has promised that if his party wins the election the closure order will be rescinded and the pit will stay open.

Now I trust you can see why it is unlikely that between now and June 9 anything will happen to provide a more perfect vade mecum for aspiring political chicken-sexers. Mrs Thatcher does not need to urge the voters to dispel the dark clouds of Marxism; she need only ask them whether they are or are not of the school that would wish to go on supporting economic activity which is literally worse than useless (worse at present by some £10m a year), in circumstances that ensure that no human being will suffer if the activity is brought to an end.

I am, of course, aware that a man writing from inside the newspaper industry is not ideally placed for condemning the practice of employing people whose work serves no detectable purpose. But the newspapers are not yet in the public sector (though Mr Scargill has demanded their nationalization, and Mr Moss Evans has urged a return to the practice of government licensing for them), and my interest in what the bosses do with their own money is confined to seeing that they provide me with ample quantities of it.

Besides, what we do about the nationalized industries (of which there will be a good few more if Labour wins the election) has a bearing not only on the proportion of national resources used by the state but, by example as well as economic policy, on private industry as well; if the present government is returned and starts to do to the public sector what it has hitherto only promised to do, I may yet live (I am reasonably fit for a man of my age) to see the principles espoused by the Coal Board at Cardowan flowing, Etna-like, down Fleet Street

For the moment, though, let us concentrate on the election and on its illumination by the events at the Scottish pit. On the one side is a beleaguered organization, with a statutory duty to seek economic efficiency, deciding on the discontinuation of a line of goods that cannot be made efficiently or indeed at all except at ruinous expense and for which no customers can be found, while taking care to ensure that even the employees who have contributed to the inefficiency are looked after. On the other side is a state of mind in which the only thing that matters is to make sure that anything that has been done in the past and is being done at the present must go on being done in saecula saeculorum.

It is useless to tell the Labour Party that the principle espoused by the Coal Board at Cardowan provides the only explanation for the fact that the human race has become more prosperous over the centuries; if it comes to that, it is useless to tell the Labour Party that it would not make sense for 1,090 coalminers to be employed to scrape my toast when I burn it and carry the scrapings away in a wheelbarrow for sale as Nutty Slack, Grade One. The Labour Party believes that prosperity droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven, that it is Something noble and grand and good,

Won by merely wishing we could,

and that if there are men who scrape my toast they must be kept in employment even if there is no sale for the scrapings, indeed even if the toast is not burnt, nay, even if I give up eating toast at breakfast, burnt or unburnt, altogether.

On that ground they take their stand, and on that ground they solicit my vote and the votes of others, a solicitation which in my case (I do not claim to speak for the others) is in vain. I have hopes, though so far no more than hopes, that the Conservative Party will, no doubt with due discretion, now embroider this crucial principle on their battleflag, and march to victory beneath it. But my voting intentions, and the outcome of the election, are not really germane to my task today, which is simply to draw attention to the remarkably clear way in which the choice before the electorate has been presented, before the ink on the election proclamation is dry. Britain has had in her time a Khaki Election, a Coupon Election, a Midlothian Election. It is possible that in 1983 we shall find ourselves taking part in a Cardowan Election.

JUNE X 83

Jock Bruce-Gardyne

Like most members of the House of Commons, I suspect, I looked upon elections as something akin to periodic obligatory medical examinations. At best, time-consuming; at worst, fraught with disaster. Needless to say now I am excused attendance for the first time in 20 years I feel miserable about it. Each campaign swiftly develops its own special character. Yet of the six I fought all save one, I believe, had one feature in common: the result was a foregone conclusion from the day of dissolution. The exception, of course, was February 1974 (not June 1970 – on that occasion Labour's brief and misleading lead in the campaign got the party preferences all right, but slipped up on propensity to vote). But I find Barbara Castle's analogy between this election and that of February 1974 perverse. On that occasion the Government resorted most reluctantly to the country in the hope that this would somehow resolve a calamitous industrial conflict. In short it asked a silly question, and got the answer it deserved. There is no conceivable parallel with June 1983.

This campaign, at any rate, does not look like being an exception to my rule. A couple of weeks ago I was chatting to a lobby journalist when a prominent Labour left-winger joined us. "How's things?", the journalist asked him. He gave a great groan: "It's written in the skies." What was written he didn't say. But nothing, one gathered, for Michael Foot's comfort.

Talking of Michael Foot, what on earth were his minders up to allowing the old gentleman to launch his campaign before the cameras on Hampstead Heath, in tow to his hairy little dog and stick in air – the very model of the mad professor? I have never gone along with the view that modern elections are simple personality contests between the rival leaders. If they were Ted Heath could not have won in 1970, nor Mrs T perhaps in 1979 – let alone Clem Attlee in 1945. Still, it is hard to believe that Michael Foot will strike the average voter as the sort of bloke it would be safe to let loose in Downing Street.

It is just as well, therefore, that counselling the Prime Minister to eschew complacency would be as superfluous as urging Mr Jenkins not to neglect the inner man, or reminding Mr Healey that consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds. She is not given to resting on her laurels, the opinion polls, or anything else for that matter. There is little danger of encouragement being given to the apathy abstainers this time. If the Tory campaign has got off to a slightly slower start than those of our opponents, that is by calculation. And well judged, I'd guess: three weeks is more than enough for most of our fellow-citizens.

If there is a hazard to the Government it is not apathy, but tactical voting. This propensity of the citizen to switch his vote to save it being "wasted" used to be confined to by-elections. But more recently (encouraged, no doubt, by the preference of local Labour parties for loony lecturers as candidates) it has been spreading to general elections too. So on balance if I were fighting this election I think I would rather Labour did keep Tony Wedgwood Benn under wraps. In a good many seats the less the Labour faithful know about their party, the better from the Tory point of view.

What, then, of the manifestos? I got into hot water with some of my colleagues for suggesting, just before the 1979 election, in an article in "another" newspaper, some specific plans for public spending cuts to be included in our manifesto. Just the stuff to frighten the horses, I was told. My justification was that manifestos matter when you've won, and need to get the Whitehall machine to swallow unpalatable medicine: in terms of winning or losing votes they lack potency. I would stand by that.

The Tory manifesto was yet to see the light of day at time of writing. Of the other two, Labour's has had a well-merited roasting; that of the Alliance has been praised with faint damns. I wonder whether that is altogether right. Labour's vision is 1974-75 with knobs on, and would not take a twelvemonth to bring back the brokers' men from the International Monetary Fund. The Gang of Four have in mind a replay of 1972-74, with "responsible reflation" pinned together by the statutory control of incomes. That would take rather longer to bring us back to Arthur Scargill and Moss Evans parking their tanks in Downing Street. Give me the brokers' men any day.

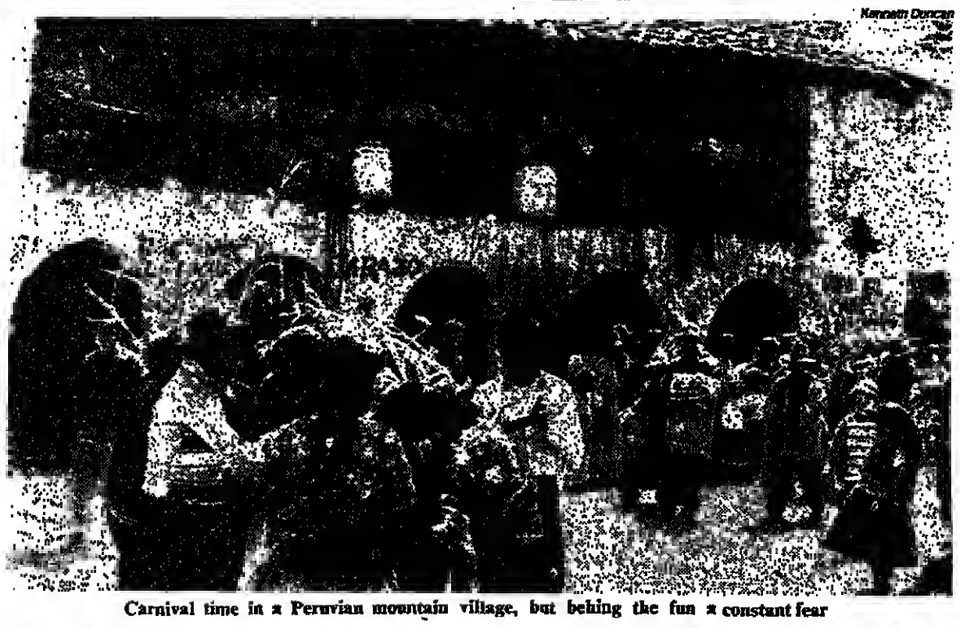
Trail of death along the Shining Path



Kenneth Duncan

Carnival time in a Peruvian mountain village, but behing the fun a constant fear

Lima

Reports of bloody clashes between the security forces and left-wing guerrillas have become routine in the central highlands of Peru. Official figures put the number of deaths in the first four months of this year at 455, compared with 138 in the whole of 1982. Altogether, 776 people are said to have died since hostilities began in May, 1980.

The Ayacucho region, where the fighting is taking place, has been under military control since last December, and all official information is channelled through General Clemente Noel, the sole authority for the region. He will answer no questions, and journalists are banned from areas where clashes are said to be taking place. Everything is quiet in the town of Ayacucho, where some 2,000 troops are based, but there are signs that a very "dirty" war is being fought in the countryside against the Maoist guerrillas of the Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) movement.

The general's version of events, which is reproduced with few exceptions by the Lima press, seems to have more to do with psychological warfare than with an accurate account. It is designed to destroy any sympathy that the local population might have for the guerrillas, and to give the impression that they are rapidly being wiped out. But this is highly doubtful

A constant feature of military reports of armed clashes is that no bodies are produced, few names are given, and no detailed account is supplied of the circumstances. No military casualties are ever reported. The 307 deaths reported in April were made up of 166 Senderistas and 141 peasants. The authorities claim that Sendero Luminoso has been carrying out indiscriminate massacres of villagers who refuse to support the guerrillas, or have sided with the elected government of President Fernando Belaúnde Terry.

Few people in Ayacucho, however, believe that this is what is happening. Sendero's brand of fundamentalist Maoism places great emphasis on close relations with the poor peasantry, whose interests the guerrillas claim to represent.

The guerrillas are capable of great brutality – it is a brutal society – but it is difficult to see what they would have to gain from random killings.

Sendero operations have included raids on large estates, and the execution of local officials and notables (such as shopkeepers and moneylenders) singled out as exploiters of the poor peasants. The guerrillas have usually gone through a form of "popular trial", in which the charges are read out to the assembled villagers, and they are asked to decide on execution or some less drastic form of exemplary punishment, such as flogging.

These actions seem to have been accepted, even welcomed, by the majority of peasants in this poverty-stricken region, where the few better-off families are easily identifiable. In some cases Sendero released people due to be executed after appeals by villagers. The summary methods of Sendero have also helped to rid isolated communities of bandits and rustlers, who often terrorize entire regions.

Since the military occupation of Ayacucho, however, the security forces have succeeded in convincing even some peasants that the guerrillas want to take away their land and property, and should be killed on sight. General Noel has been skilful both in exploiting traditional rivalries between peasant communities, and the often bitter divisions between individual villagers. By such methods as supplying food, drink and equipment, the armed forces have also recruited large numbers of spies and informers

The guerrillas seem to have stepped up the number of reprisal executions of informers in recent months, which may have lost them some support. They have also been weakened by the very speed with which the movement has spread through Ayacucho and the neighbouring departments Huancavelica and Apurimac. Sendero does not hold territory like a conventional force, but comes and goes. It cannot, therefore, defend its own sympathizers against reprisals.

The recent upsurge in killings appears to be connected, to some extent, with the growing activities of so-called "paramilitary" bands of villagers, acting as auxiliaries of the armed forces.

In some particularly brutal cases, such as that of Lucanamarca, in Victor Fajardo province, where more than 60 people were massacred, informed observers believe that "paramilitaries" may have been responsible, as a reprisal for villagers' participation in a popular trial. Official reports blamed Sendero for the slaughter, in which women and children were hacked to death with axes. A pro-government magazine said it was a senderista reprisal, after villagers rebelled against guerrilla exactions, and killed seven of them. No convincing evidence was produced, however.

Axes are the preferred weapon of peasants from the village of Uchuraccay, many miles to the north, who killed eight Peruvian journalists in late January. An official commission of inquiry, concluded that the villagers had mistaken the approaching journalists for guerrillas, and immediately attacked them.

This report, however, leaves many difficult questions unanswered, and other evidence points to the involvement of paramilitary bands, with or without the direct involvement of the security forces. One theory is that the journalists had stumbled on the formation of such bands in a nearby village and were on their way to investigate. They were killed, according to this account, to prevent them producing evidence that would have contradicted the official claim that whole villages were spontaneously turning against the guerrillas.

The paramilitary bands, which are also known as peasant patrols, have natural leaders in former national servicemen; one of them is thought to have been involved in Uchuraccay, but has never been arrested.

Whichever side is doing the killing, there is little doubt that it is peasants rather than guerrillas who are dying. Although Sendero has been cleared out of the city and some other areas that it once dominated, there is nothing to support official contentions that it is all but beaten.

The wavering harvest Foot could reap

The majority of MPs are convinced that a Conservative victory on June 9 is a foregone conclusion. The Conservative Party began the campaign with a larger lead, sustained over a longer period of time, than any political party since 1945. Margaret Thatcher, the resolute victor of the Falklands war, dwarfs Michael Foot in the opinion polls. And the anti-Tory vote will be split between the Labour Party and the Alliance.

Most informed commentators have also written off Labour's chances. They point to profound social changes that favour the Conservative Party. The growth of home ownership and the contraction of the manual working class has shrunk Labour's base, while an ideological shift to the right has allegedly undermined support for Labour's policies.

The oft-repeated claim that the country has moved decisively to the right is merely an intuitive assumption inferred from the Tories' continuing lead in the opinion polls. It is not borne out by surveys of public attitudes which reveal a tenacious, if somewhat bewildered, commitment to the old consensus based on welfare, capitalism and tripartite management of the economy.

The latest MORI survey shows, for instance, that Thatcherite initiatives on promoting private health insurance, encouraging private education and cutting local council spending are supported by only one in three people. Yet the same study reveals a remarkably resilient commitment to the corporate politics of the late 1970s; those in favour of the government working closely with the unions and of ensuring that management consults unions over key company decisions outnumbered those against by a margin of more than two to one.

These last two proposals are incorporated into Labour's new manifesto. Indeed, the most striking finding of the survey (based on a large national quota sample) is the strength of support that exists for the key elements of Labour's alternative economic strategy.

The overwhelming majority (including substantial numbers of Conservative and Alliance supporters) favour price and import controls and increased public spending to create jobs.

Labour enjoys popular support for other policies, as well as being assessed more positively than the Conservative Party on the issue judged to be paramount – jobs. It is now in a much stronger position than it was in the 1979 general election when, as Professor Ivor Crewe has demonstrated, many of its policies were unpopular, even among its supporters, some of whom appear to have voted Labour more out of loyalty than conviction. Indeed, the situation has now been reversed: Labour's policies are now more popular than the party.

Labour's task in the campaign will thus be to convert support for its policies into hard votes. In this, it may well be helped by the lack of commitment of a large section of the electorate to all the political parties. Between 23 per cent and 29 per cent of the electorate (depending on the poll), say that they may change their voting intention during the campaign. The potential exists for an electoral upset.

A further unpredictable factor is tactical voting. Although the anti-Tory vote is arguably split between the Alliance and Labour, it may coalesce in ways that are not anticipated. Surveys suggested that a significant number of Labour and Alliance supporters do not share the mutual antagonism of their party leaders, and will support the non-Tory candidate most likely to win in their constituency.

Nor is social change as one-sidedly to the advantage of the Conservatives as commentators are suggesting. The decline of social deference has chipped away the cement binding working class traditionalists to the Conservative Party. The rise of mass unemployment has hit certain groups particularly badly, most notably women. The growing union recruitment of the lower middle class, now more subject to management pressure for increased productivity of the sort experienced by manual workers, also has unpredictable consequences.

The personal, vote-winning magnetism of Margaret Thatcher has also been exaggerated. Satisfaction with her premiership (44 per cent) is currently slightly lower than it was for Douglas-Home (47 per cent) at the beginning of the 1964 general election. Her personality has probably also contributed to the widely diffused image of the Conservative Party as a narrowly class-bound and uncaring party – a view that is particularly prevalent among uncommitted voters.

However, the Conservative Party has significant electoral strengths that Labour will need to dent in the next three weeks. The Conservatives are rated more favourably on the important issues of prices, law and order and (to a lesser extent) defence. Labour has an unfortunate image of being divided and unprofessional, and support for its economic policies is also qualified, in some people's minds, by concern about the inflationary consequences.

Whether Labour has left it too late to repair its disunited image and effectively project its economic alternative remains to be seen. What is clear, in view of the Tories' rapidly diminishing lead in the opinion polls, is that the election result should not be prejudged.

Arctophily for that warm, friendly feeling

If the wayward Lord Sebastian Flyte of Brideshead Revisited had listened more often to his teddy bear Aloysius than to his very odd Oxford friends he would never have ended up dead drunk in a ditch in Tunisia. We might all benefit from a word or two with our childhood bruins and anyone who thinks there is anything namby pamby or cissy about teddies had better keep his mouth shut in front of Lt-Col Robert Henderson, Royal Scots (retired).

When the Colonel was on Montgomery's staff he kept a small teddy bear, buried deep in his kitbag, which he regarded as a talisman of a new order. "It was my link with home and happiness. I always had my little bear with me. I got a great deal of comfort from that bear and it helped me get through the war."

When he left the army he helped found the International Good Bears of the World Movement, which sends bears to sick and needy children. From his greystone house in Edinburgh, where he now has 550 bears of his own, he has just brought out the 41st edition of the movement's journal, Bear Tracks.

"The teddy bear is the most wonderful ambassador of peace and would stop all wars," said the Colonel, now 79. General Patton would probably have had him shot if he had ever overheard him voicing such a thought. But if Patton had bought a teddy instead of pearl-handled six-shooters he might have been a nicer man.

Just try explaining Thrasymachus's argument in Plato's Republic that Might is Right to a golden syrup coloured creature who knows you are secretly frightened of the dark. After about three minutes you realize it's all a bit silly.

"Our society does not exist just to give a sick child a teddy," said the Colonel. "We want to find out more about the power of the bear. Why we like teddy bears is, as Lady Antonia Fraser says in her History of Toys, one of the most interesting psychological problems of our time. My own papers on the mystique of the bear are all based on Jungian psychology. He made a great deal of the archetypal symbolic bear in alchemy and ancient mythology".

All of which is not as strange as it sounds. Studies in America have shown the teddy bear to be a powerful giver of solace, especially in the case of a child in hospital. Rabbits, dogs and dollies do not elicit the same emotional response.

The Colonel has written a series of papers, one day to be published as a book, on why bears disarm us. Deep down everyone is an arctophilist, a lover of bears. The craze started on one of President Theodore "Teddy" Roosevelt's hunting expeditions.

The President, not famous for his finer feelings, saw a cuddly bear cub abandoned by its mother looking at him with pleading eyes, and for some reason could not bring himself to blow its head off. The act of mercy was lampooned by a cartoonist in the Washington Star and someone naturally started making "teddy bears" to cash in on the joke. "The Americans go in for teddies in a big way," added the Colonel. "Mat Murphy, the president of the Bank of Montreal in San Francisco has more than a thousand."

One used to travel in state everywhere with a bygone King of Thailand while another scaled the Matterhorn. A teddy soldiered with the Polish Free Forces during the war and was promoted to the rank of brigadier because of the luck he brought.

But teddies can sometimes slip up. One called Mr Woppit sat next to land and water speed ace Donald Campbell as he somersaulted to eternity on Coniston Water.

Bears have a great sense of propriety; Rupert Bear was never at home in the naughty magazine Oz. When a naked man jumped into a bear pit a London Zoo recently, bruins Rusty and Tumble, who together weigh half a ton, fled in panic like affronted spinsters.

PRIMA INTER PARES

British Cabinet Government is a robust and flexible instrument. It has functioned efficiently in both peace, total war and limited war. In the twentieth century the demands of mobilising the home front and despatching expeditionary forces abroad have proved powerful engines for its development and extension. The experieoce of Lloyd George, who in 1916 expanded the secretariat of the Committee of Imperial Defence into a proper Cabinet machioe, aod Mr Winstoo Churchill, who in 1940 created a hefty yet effective Cabinet Committee apparatus to run the British branch of World War II, both illustrate the wisdom of Professor Arthur Marwick's dictum that:

"Wars are like weddings: essentially extravagant and unnecessary, but a great stimulant io a convention-bound society".

In 1945 Mr Clement Attlee consolidated the Coalition's Cabinet Committee Structure and made it the engine room of his administration. For all her rhetoric about rolling back the state, Mrs Margaret Thatcher's Cabinet system is the unmistakeable, though slimmer desceodant of Mr Attlee's. She did not want any Cabinet committees in May 1979. But eveots took care of that. In four years she has created some 25 standing Cabinet Committees against 157 in 6¼ years by Mr Attlee; and about 95 ad hoc "MISC" groups to Mr Attlee's 306 "GENS".

It is, therefore, of more than minor interest when the impression gets abroad that a fundamental shift in the nature of Cabinet Government is under way. There is a view that Mrs Thatcher aspires to be a "president uoder the crown". It even crept into the election campaign on the BBC Panorama programme on Monday night when Mr John Silkin, the Whitehall-watcher of the Labour front bench, described her as "a very presidential kind of Prime Minister".

The "President Thatcher" image is misplaced. Apart from anything else, Mr Ronald Reagan, the real President upon whom presumably she would have to model herself, is in the process of constructing something passably like a Cabinet Committee system in Washington. He has created six new "cabinet councils" for domestic and economic affairs. His administration even contains a public spendiog committee almost identical to Mrs Thatcher's MISC 62, the "Star Chamber" established to enforce cuts on reluctant ministers.

During the election campaign, there will be attempts io reinforce the impression of a constitutional shift. Since the first truly television election of 1959, in which the Macmillan – Gaitskell rivalry acquired, by previous British standards, distinctly presidential overtones, electoral contests have inevitably become personalized campaigns. Mrs Thatcher's recently proclaimed intention to build up her Prime Minister's Office in Downing Street, if re-elected, adds another element to the story.

As our series in The Times this week has shown, it would be premature to suggest that such a shift has, in fact, occurred. As a very senior Whitehall figure, who has helped several premiers through their darker moments, said privately recently: "I do not think we are within a million miles of having prime ministerial government in this country".

Naturally, a modern Prime Minister must be more than primus inter pares if the system is to function. Policy initiation and leadership would seize up if that were not so. Mrs Thatcher like all her post-war predecessors is a rung above her secretaries of state. But he, like those who have gone before, has an acute sense of wha she can get through Cabinet and what will fail.

Will a stengthened Prime Minister's Office push her too far up the ladder? It might do so, if she disbanded the Cabinet Office, which srves ministers collectively, an subsumed it into a new Prme Minister's Department leo and largely staffed by her own ontside political appointee. That would mean a decisive shift in the constitutional arrangements of the Cabinet system. If there was temptation in the aermath of the Falklands, who she felt badly served by the machine, it seems now to have pased.

An enlarged Prime finister's Office containing hand-picked policy analysts to collan fat files of information to save her time would be a sensible innvation working with the gran of established constitutional principle and sound administrative practice. Mrs Thatcher may recruit up to 20 people om within the bureaucracy nd outside to work alongside Fo-fessor Alan Walters, Sir Antoy Parsons, Mr Ferdinand Mout and Mr Roger Jackling. Ther would also be a chief-of-staff name at present unknown. Such an office should be peopled with independent minds.

The test for the Prime Minister and her future chief-of-staff must be: will the remodelled office survive a change of government? Or will it be seen as an artifact of an overmighty premier and suffer the fate of Lloyd George's "Garden Snburb" in 1922? If she returns to Downing Street on June 10, Mrs Thatcher has a chance to build something of valne, not just for herself, but for the future holders of prime ministerial office. She should not waste it.

THE BLACK HOPE OF AFRICA

It is very sad to see the Kenyan political elite indulging in infighting when the economic hardship currently afflicting all Africa requires such a poor country to hold together as never before. More is the pity that elements of the Kenyan press and not a few politicians have unjustifiably threatened to embroil Britain, Kenya's staunchest ally, in the country's internal arguments.

As is so often the case in one-party states – albeit relatively tolerant ones, like Kenya – the knifework is being donc behind the scenes; no one knows precisely what is happening or which politicians will emerge on top or at the bottom. Political attacks are being made more by allusion and parable than by frontal assault; there is talk of hyena and snake; unknown "foreign powers" are said to be "grooming" favourites; alas, it is partly President Daniel Arap Moi's own hyperbole that has excited rumour-fed suspicion and tho consequent wave of instability as perceived abroad.

Nor has an alleged "traitor", said more by innuendo than by hard evidence to have been plotting, been named. Political observers in Nairobi say that fingers have been pointing at Mr Charles Njoojo, the Minister for Constitutional Affairs and certainly an outspoken proponent of Keoya's pro-Western orientation. He is a powerful man with many enomies eager to soatch at an opportunity to embarrass him. But he is an exceptionally shrewd and tough political operator, unlikely to be easily written off by innuendo or even by presidential dictat.

Kenya has never quite recovered from the bloody but abortive coup attempt of last August, when probably at least a thousand, perhaps twice that figure, died. The putsch was launched by NCOs and junior officers of the ground-based Kenya Air Regiment, just the sort of dissident breeding ground expected in time of economic stress.

In the past five years or so, standards of living for most Kenyans have dropped. The rural poor, still the vast majority, are to some extent inured to misfortune caused, among other things, by the vagaries of climate; at the lower end of the burgeoning new urban class, however, the pinch has become more painful, and is worsened by the sight of the privileged and politically well connected maintaining their extremely comfortablo lifestyles, while mismanagement and corruption continue.

But there has been an enduring uneasy feeling that other disgruntled people, especially students and certain sections of the armed forces, havo been playing a game of wait-and-see. It was gratifying to Mr Moi and to his friends in the West that the large bulk of tho forces, and probably the average Kenyan too, did swing behind him. But rumours that other conp plots were on the point of hatching have not been fully scotched. Some ministers, it has been mooted, have been waiting in the wings for Mr Moi to trip up.

Some weeks after the coup, the rumour mills began working again when tho head of the police, previously known as a strong Moi supporter, was disgraced. Later the airforce chief was sentenced for failing to report the coup having known it to be imminent.

The trouble, in fact, goes back way beyond August. In the admirably smooth transition after the death of Mr Kenyatta in 1978, a triumvirate took over. At its head was Mr Moi, the constitutional heir apparent: solid, respected, a sound administrator with oo special éclat and from a small tribe with no great clout of its own. There was Mr Mwai Kibaki, Vice-President and at the time Finante Minister: an urbane, clever though not particularly assertive Kikuyu with notable economic skills; and Mr Njonjo, then the Attorney-General, also a Kikuyu though from a different region from Mr Kibaki's: an eminence grise with no popular base but an unrivalled knowledge of manipulating the legal and civil service machinery.

At least two years ago it was evident that the triumvirate had lost its cohesion. Mr Moi has been sharply increasing his own powerbase, especially among the Kalenjin (to which his own small Tugen group belongs), to the dismay of Kikuyu chauvinists accustomed to having a disproportionate slice of the cake. Mr Njonjo, becoming an MP and vigorously building up a measure of popular support in Kikuyuland, fell out with Mr Kibaki and gave the impression of coveting the vice-presidency, which automatically assumes power for a critical three months should the president die. Mr Moi, it seems, has become exasperated by the battle for supremacy in Kikuyuland.

Kenya's enemies, especially Tanzania, are no doubt delighted. There is also a growing body of leftist opinion in the West that is against the Kenyan regime. It points out with relish that, since the coup, the freedoms vaunted by Kenya since independence – a wide degree of public debate, even a sort of pluralism, within the one-party framework; a combative, more or less open press; academic liberty; an absence of political prisoners – have been curtailed. That is sadly true. But in Africa comparisons are crucial. Set against its neighbours, especially sanctimonious Tanzania, Kenya remains a beacon of humanity, sanity and openness.

The press is leaned npon but diverse; Tanzania has no press worthy of the name at all. A dozen Kenyan intellectuals are detained without trial: a tiny number when compared with the thousands imprisooed without trial for various offences in past decades in Tanzania and in Kenya's other four neighbours. University debate has been cramped and politicians put under pressure to conform. But despite the fear, Kenya is still more free than most.

But Mr Moi lacks the stature of Mr Kenyatta. Kenya, with its horrifying population increase and dearth of natural resources (it is far poorer, potentially, than Tanzania), is passing throngh a bad patch, economic and political. On balance, however, it still deserves every sort of assistance. In this time of trouble, Mr Moi needs to play his hand firmly. But his cards are weaker than before, and he should not nervously overplay them.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

From Mr M. M. Guerreiro

Sir, Deepak Lal's excellent and illuminating article on the international debt crisis (May 6) does have one important shortcoming. Dr Lal's article makes the relevant point that the current level of international indebtedness is low in comparison with historical levels earlier io this century. However, he fails to emphasize the crucial distinctions between contemporary sovereign bank lending and the earlier forms of invesment.

In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries most ioternational capital movements were either direct foreign iovestments (as in foreign-owned mines or factories) or privately held portfolio investments in specific enterprises (as in railway bonds, etc). In either case, the purposes of the loans were known and the commercial viability of the ventures could be assessed. Io contrast, most contemporary commercial finace to developing nations has taken the form of bank loans to sovereign governments.

This development has had several important consequences:

1. There is no longer any necessary link between the contemporary loans and viable projects which will provide the returns necessary to repay the debts.

2. Previously, there were no "cross default" agreements whereby if one loan went bad, all were held to be in default.

3. Unlike earlier private ventures, governments cannot go bankrupt as the result of imprudeot investments (or at least so the banks thought).

The effect of these three factors was to reduce the incentives for lenders to charge appropriate risk premiums and take measures to assure that the loans would be invested productively.

Another factor of major importance is that the earlier forms of international finance were not inextricably entwined with the domestic credit systems of the lending nations. Thus when Brazil defaulted on its bonds in the 1930s, banks didn't collapse in Europe; instead private investors lost out.

For all of these reasous the contemporary pattern of international commercial lending, while modest in scale, is far less stable than that which existed prior to the Great Depression.

CND and communism

From Mrs Diana Collins

Sir, I am grateful to Lord Home for his generous and courteous letter of apology (May 14) and I accept entirely that he never had any intention of making any reflection on my late husband's integrity.

Sioce, however, I have in front of me extracts from Lord Home's original speech (July 22, 1961) and also the full text of the correspon-ence between him and my late husband, I feel obliged to correct Lord Home on further statements made in his letter of May 9.

In his speech Lord Home did not specify any organization, but most people, including the media, members of whom immediately contacted my husband, took it that his remarks were aimed at CND.

My husband wrote protesting at Lord Home's suggestion that organizations were penetrated by communist "propagandists who are planted and paid and extremely well informed. He asked for evidence to substantiate such a claim in respect of CND. There was at no point any question of my husband threatening Lord Home with a libel action and he said nothing about Christian Action.

Lord Home replied that he "expected" individual communists to "have joined genuine organizations with instructions to penetrate them for their own ends". He produced no evidence to substantiate his original statement.

My husband never denied the presence of individual communists in CND, in fact he discussed the matter openly in his book Faith Under Fire. He was always aware of communist interest and activity.

I can testify categorically that there were never any communists oo any committee of Christia. Action, of which my husband was also chairman.

I can find nothing to substantiate Lord Home's story that four communists wrote to the press stating that they "admitted" that they were on my husband's executive committee. He does not say which executive committee.

Yours faithfully,
DIANA COLLINS,
11 Rennie Court,
Stamford Street, SE1.
May 16.

From Mr M. Graham-Jones

Sir, Canoo Collins was succeeded as Chairman of Christian Action by the Rev John Drewett, who then died almost at once. I succeeded him and therefore know something of those matters which have got Lord Home of The Hirsel into such a tangle (his letters of May 9 and 14). It is important that they be straightened out io public for the words of a former Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary carry weight with many supporters of voluntary organisations.

Lord Home knows better than most of us that there is only one way in which an organisation can make sure of not being penetrated (whether by agents of communist Powers, the South African Government or the CIA). That way is to close down. Is that what Lord Home would have our voluntary bodies do?

When working closely with Canoo Collins, occasionally representing him and Christian Actioo at ioternational gatherings (World Peace Council and others) we did all we could to distinguish between those people Canon Collins called "harmless sentimentalists", "silly dupes", "hirelings", or "fellow travellers" from those men and women of iotegrity with whom he believed the Christian had a duty to engage in dialogue.

Are the catogories now identified by the Apostolic Pro-Nuncio so different? Are there grounds for believing that Mgr Kent is less well aware of the challenges than was Canoo Collins?

Yours faithfully

The chaplain's role

From Canon Eric James

Sir, It is a nice idea of Captain Christopher Ward, RN (May 14) that "our chaplains' role is totally non-political". It bears, I fear, little relation to reality in time of war.

I happen to collect the printed sermons of Bishop Wionington-Ingram, Bishop of London during the Great War. I have before me now the picture of him in uniform as Chaplain to the Loodoo Rifle Brigade and his sermoo to soldiers at Bisley (September 6, 1914) entitled, "The Holy War".

He wrote io the Guardian for June 10, 1915: "Yoo ask for my advice in a sentence as to what the Church is to do. I answer, mobilise the nation for a holy war."

The Bishop twice received in writing the thanks of Lord Kitchener.

ERIC JAMES,

Pension discrimination

From Mr D. C. Spencer

Sir, It ill becomes Lord Byers to attribute to the views of others their lack of the rudimeots of arithmetic. His letter (May 5) makes it clear that he does not understand the financial iojustice which is built into pension schemes that are based oo final-year incomes.

This fundamental inequity is perhaps best seen by comparing two employees who stay to the same scheme throughout their working lives: one on a low, stable income – typically a shop-floor worker – the other who progresses upwards through a number of executive/managerial grades.

In extreme cases the yields in terms of pension io relation to the actuarial value of their individual contributions (i.e., their personal pension pots) will be more thao twice as high for the secood person as for the first. The essence of all final-year schemes is that the pensions of the better paid are subsidised from the contributions of the lower paid.

Lord Byers's "snag" is that this injustice would oot be perpetuated.

Yours sincerely,
D. C. SPENCER,

May 10.

From Mr Stuart Walker

Sir, A young leaver from a pension fund is usually offered a smaller amount of transfer money than that made available for an older leaver with the same record of service with the employer.

Conversely, an older applicant for a job, being more costly as regards the pension contributions to be paid by the new employer, is less likely to be successful than a young applicant with the same qualifications.

Is equality in employmeot served by discriminating in opposite ways on the grouods of the ages of leavers and joiners?

Yours faithfully,
STUART WALKER,

BBC needs and market solutions

From Mr W. Bishop and Dr C. Veljanovski

Sir, Dr Morgan, an adviser to the Director General of the BBC, takes issue (May 9) with the market solution to the allocation of radio frequencies which we advocated in Choice by Cable, recently published by the Institute of Economic Affairs. She suggests that the proposal is somewhat fanciful because it ignores two considerations: that radio frequencies are allocated by international agreement and that the decision to use frequencies for public-sector uses is a political assessment that "cannot be left to the market". Both assertions are unpersuasive and sidestep the real issues.

First, it is incorrect to assert that frequency allocation in the UK is solely the province of international negotiation. The Home Office plays an important role io allocating frequencies to users and uses. We recommended radical reform of management of the radio spectrum.

To assess our proposal, the proper comparison is not between political allocation and market allocation in principle, but how they will operate in practice. Dr Morgan discusses neither their relative merits nor the views of the Merriman committee, which has concluded that Home Office procedures have been unsatisfactory.

Second, Dr Morgan asserts that the market cannot value, and be trusted to deal with, the allocation of resources to law and order, the NHS and defence of national security. She says that public services of this kind should receive frequencies free of charge. Carried to its logical extreme, Dr Morgan would find herself advocating the free provision of police cars and ambulances to the public sector and, we suppose, free appropriation of food, fuel (and labour?) by hospitals.

If allocatioo of frequencies must be a political matter theo certainly that of food must be also, since it is essential to life. The plaio fact is that in most areas the police, NHS and the BBC have to pay for what they use or else they don't get it.

Yet all this misses the real attraction of the market solution. By pricing frequencies, users, whether public or private, are provided with an incentive to ecooomise, to use scarce frequency space efficiently; an incentive that is absent at preseot. The eurrent system conceals the social costs of the forgone opportunities that have resulted from mismanagement of the radio spectrum identified by Merriman. The erroneous assumption that infects Dr Morgan's criticisms is that frequencies are costless.

Finally it was not our claim that the BBC should be dismantled or that public-service broadcasting had no justification – pace Dr Morgan, Mr Davies's analysis was not based on our book. Nor does the proposal for a frequency market or auction obviate the oeed for the Government to make political choices.

If the Government wants a BBC, then that decision will be reflected in the increased licence fee necessary to purchase the frequencies in competition with others. Io this way the Government and the viewer can assess whether this is the best use of the spectrum, because both will have a measure of the opportunities to society forgone by using the spectrum for BBC transmission rather than the next best alternative use.

From Mr Bernard Braden

Sir, When I read "Do we really need the BBC?" by Howard Davies (feature, April 26) I dismissed it as a column filler on a bad day. The fact that readers might take it as a subject for serious debate never occurred to me.

May I suggest Mr Davies might just as well have posed the question: "Do we really need The Times?". In spite of the vicissitudes of the past few years it seems we do because you're still here.

What you have in common with the BBC is that, given many faults, you are national institutions, and as such, must be preserved. This is not jingoism, but the answer to a grave threat that has not been fully realised.

The real difference between "narrow-casting" and "broadcasting" is that the latter represents a national forum of opinion and entertainment, while the former proposes fragmentation of viewing, not just parochially, but in interests and tastes. This would be acceptable if it didn't pose a threat to broadcasting, which it does.

In the United States there are three major networks, all with the same aim . . .to compete for viewers in numbers, regardless of quality. As such these oetworks are employers of independent producers who bid against one another for the lowest common denominator.

The only areas in which the American oetworks function as producers are io news and sport. Their figures are being seriously eroded by cable televisipo, pay TV, and will be further affected by satellite, which has been described by someone as a substitute for thought.

Io this country, we have BBC 1 and 2, because if it goes under it will take ITV with it. Changes will be made. Laudable though it was to appeal to minorities those minorities were too small and too aggressive to be anything but a "turn off" for most viewers.

TV-am, in my view, overlooks two crucial factors. One is national radio and the other national daily papers, oeither of which is available to the American public.

The single factor that most improved the BBC was the arrival of ITV. It would be inconceivable now to think of either as a monopoly, but together they constitute a national souoding board which it would be madness not to protect.

Yours sincerely,
BERNARD BRADEN,

Labour's 'typical' voter

From Dr Martin Holmes

Sir, While io agreement with most of Robert Waller's article (May 11) it may also be argued that Labour has already broadeoed its electoral appeal to include many middle-class voters.

The public sector expansion of the 1960s under Harold Wilsoo created a middle-class electorate io the universities, polytechnics, the health service and, particularly, local government, who preferred Labour to the other parties. This newly created "intellectual" middle-class electorate has made inroads ioto the Labour Party itself with regard to candidate selection and the recent stress on such issues as civil liberties and CND's unilateralist fundamentalism.

Labour's typical voter may still be, as Robert Waller implies, a manual worker, but the trend is already established towards the middle-class Guardian-reading Tatchell man (or other persoo) whose ideological socialist commitment is oot tempered by the income and affluenoy that middle-class people enjoy.

Yours sincerely,
MARTIN HOLMES,
Lady Margaret Hall,

Civil Service queries

From the General Secretary of the Association of First Division Civil Servants

Sir, Your Labour Correspondeot reported on May 10 that leaders of the Civil Service unions "are to take the unprecedented step of launching a campaign among their 500,000 members pointing out the dangers of voting Conservative in oext month's election".

What is in fact happening, however, is very different: the unions are inviting all four main political parties to answer 10 questions about their policies oo key issues affecting the Civil Service. The sort of questions asked are: "What principles would your party adopt for determining Civil Service pay?" "What is your party's policy on current and future Civil Service staffing levels?"

The answers will be published in a leaflet to members which will include the words: "We are not making a recommendation about how you should vote. But we do think that all our members are entitled to know where the political parties stand on some of the most important issues affecting them."

Yours faithfully,
JOHN WARD, General Secretary,

Parish pump apathy

From Mrs M. Lochner

Sir, May I, as a member of West Sussex County Council's Planning Committee, make the following points oo your report of May 5 and Mrs Ann Howe's letter of May 11 about exploratory oil drilling at Baxter's Copse, Graffham.

During the past 10 years we have had many such applications and have become accustomed to the occasional heavy machine crawling about the country lanes in a search.

As the authority concerned with strategic planning, it is our duty to take into consideration the national interest as well as, but not paramount to, the local one. For this reason we need to know where oil may be found – as in other cases such as sand and gravel.

It does oot follow that the subsequent planning permission for its extraction would be allowed. This would be most carefully considered io relation to an amenity area which Mrs Howe and I valoe equally.

County Hall may seem remote to her, but I can assure her that elected members of the council are not.

Yours faithfully,
MARY LOCHNER,

Signs and portents?

From the Reverend Dr B. Clark

Sir, With the announcemeot of the general election for June 9 I turned to my diary, which offers a daily thought, and for June 9 it reminds us of the words of Bismarck: "People never lie so much as after a hunt, during a war and before an election."

Sir, Io 1066 the appearance of a comet of unusual brightness heralded the fall of a firm and resolute ruler of England, exhilarated by a recent victory over an invader.

Education commitment

From Mr Ben Vincent

Sir, I am puzzled at the implication of the letter (May 9) from Mr Nick Earle that schools outside the public system are more responsive to parental opinion about education than are the people's own schools. How many independent schools have strong parents' associations which elect members to the board of governors? Almost all provided schools have this link with parents. What's more, of course, the other governors are almost all elected by bodies upon which the parents are represented or for which they have votes. A high proportion of county councillors, who have general control of the schools, are parents or grandparents of children in our schools and I think this applies especially to the education committees. A high proportion were themselves educated in our schools. Very many are on close terms of acquaintance with our teachers and heads. Mr Earle evidently trembles at the risk this involves of "political" interference io the schools but in a long life in the educational world I can truly say I have never heard a single accusation of party political influence in the appointment of heads, still less of assistant staff, or of political bias in the curriculum or educational methods. My knowledge of iodependent schools leads me to think that the great majority of the governors and trustees are self-appointed and that the parents have little or no say in who shall be a governor. I think it is well known that the governors of most of the schools tend to be educationally conservative and politically Conservative as well. No political bias, iodeed!

Yours faithfully,
BEN VINCENT,

Radlett,
Hertfordshire.

A searching look

From the Rev M. J. de C. Studdert

Sir, The only time I have been really frisked by HM Customs (camping gear all removed from my mini-bus, teots unwrapped, hollow aluminium tent poles examined, camping-gas stoves scrutinized) was when I once arrived at Harwich in my Scout uniform . . . black shirt and dog collar with Scout badges. I have always assumed that my "disguise" looked too respectable.

London landings

From Dr Sean McGrail

Sir, Whether Loodon was or was not a trading centre from the fifth to the tenth century AD cannot be decided solely on the evidence of abandoned and silted-up Roman quays (pace "Findings", May 9). RNLI calls for Penlee 'facts'

The Duke of Atholl, chairman of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, yesterday spoke of the need to "establish the facts" surrounding the Penlee lifeboat disaster. It was vital to maintain a "unity of purpose" between all arms of the search-and-rescue network, he said.

He was speaking at the institution's annual meeting in London, where he announced that lifeboats put to sea a record 3,304 times last year and saved 1,281 lives, a rise of 209 on 1981.

The report of the 29-day public inquiry into the loss of the Penlee lifeboat, Solomon Browne, and the coaster, Union Star, will be made public in Penzance today, 17 months after the tragedy claimed 16 lives during a storm off the Cornish coast.

It has been compiled by Mr Richard Stone, QC, wreck commissioner and chairman of the inquiry, and three assessors, who listened to more than a million words of evidence.

The duke said it would be wrong to comment in detail while the evidence was being considered. But the RNLI committee of management had thought carefully about the inquiry and its implications.

"The earnest desire to establish the facts surrounding the loss of the lifeboat and her crew and to consider recommendations to try to avoid such tragedies in the future must be shared by all concerned", he said.

"It is also well to remember the unity of purpose which does, and which must, exist between all arms of the search-and-rescue network."

After concern was expressed over the Penlee disaster fund set up by the local council, the RNLI has incorporated in its revised disaster procedures guidelines issued by the Attorney General.

The duke praised lifeboat crews, saying: "It is not enough just to be prepared to face storms and the awesome majesty of the sea. Great skill is needed to handle the lifeboats and great experience is needed to read the seas and to know how to go about the job at hand".

He said the two new lifeboat designs, the Brede and the Tyne, both with self-righting capabilities, had proved to be excellent.

Kirk asked to reaffirm stand on antisemitism

By Robert Nowell

The Church of Scotland's General Assembly will be asked to reaffirm its "total opposition to antisemitism in all its forms" when it meets in Edinburgh on Saturday.

But the Kirk's group on Jewish-Christian consultations believes church members should go further than that.

"We must ensure that the force of law and of public opinion is mobilized against any revival of anti-Jewish feeling of the kind formerly associated with fascism", it says.

"While it is possible that Jews sometimes exaggerate such symptoms in Britain, there is no doubt that most Christians too readily close their eyes to these dangers".

Pointing out that in several European countries terrorist violence had been directed against Jews, the group states: "We have no right to assume that it cannot happen here".

The group recalls that most Jews believed it was impossible to distinguish between anti-Zionism and antisemitism. It feels there is a Christian duty to ensure that criticism of Israeli policy is never a cover for hostility to the Jewish people.

"Indeed, we now question, in the light of both European and Middle Eastern history, whether it is possible to show a proper Christian sympathy for the Jewish people without recognizing the right of existence for a sovereign state of Israel, whatever ultimate boundaries are agreed on", the group says.

OBITUARY

MONA VANGSAAE

Exceptionally gifted Danish ballerina

Mona Vangsaae, a distinguished former ballerina of the Royal Danish Ballet and subsequently well known as a producer and teacher, died in Copenhagen on May 16, aged 62. She had suffered for some time from cancer but remained active until the end.

Born in Copenhagen on April 29, 1920, Mona Vangsaae studied at the ballet school of the Royal Theatre there, and, following the customary apprenticeship, was confirmed as a member of the Royal Danish Ballet in 1938. She was promoted to the rank of solo dancer (the highest title normally conferred, equivalent to a principal in other countries) only four years later, and danced a great variety of leading roles over the next two decades until her retirement in 1963.

When the company danced in London for the first time, in 1953, she was one of three exceptionally gifted ballerinas who shared the lead roles in the classic Bournonville ballets – virtually unknown in Britain until then, and an artistic revelation. Vangsaae danced Teresina, the heroine of Napoli in its Covent Garden premiere and set a standard for the role that has rarely since been rivalled and never excelled. While bringing out the full prettiness and charm of the Bournonville style, her performances were never soft-centred but full of spirit and a splendid command of the light, swift technical demands.

The other role for which she will be chiefly remembered is her Juliet in Frederick Ashton's creation of the Prokofiev ballet in Copenhagen in 1955, brought to the Edinburgh Festival soon afterwards but unaccountably never shown in London. However, she was admired in the work of many different choreographers: among them Balanchine's Serenade, the street dancer in Massine's Old and New, Harald Lander's Bolero and the title part in Birgit Cullberg's Moon Reindeer.

Following her retirement from the stage, Vangsaae ran a ballet school in Copenhagen for some years with her former husband, Frank Schaufuss. She began her career as a producer with a staging of Napoli Act 3 in 1971 for London Festival Ballet. For that company she subsequently mounted Conservatoire and the balcony duet from Ashton's Romeo and Juliet. She later helped her son, Peter Schaufuss, with his highly praised productions and she herself put on Conservatoire for the Royal Ballet at Covent Garden last December.

She was created a Knight of the Dannebbrog in recognition of her services to Danish ballet. Besides her son, she had a daughter who is an actress at the Royal Theatre, Copenhagen.

PROF KEITH STEWARTSON

Professor Keith Stewartson, F.R.S., who died on May 7 aged 57, was Goldsmid Professor of Mathematics at University College London. He was recognized universally for his remarkably perceptive and original researches into the applications of mathematics, especially to the dynamics of floids in motion.

Born on September 20, 1925, he was educated at Stockton Secondary School and St Catherine's College, Cambridge, where his studies in the mathematical tripos led to research work under the guidance of Professor L Howarth, F.R.S., culminating in the Ph.D. degree. In 1949 he was appointed Lecturer in Applied Mathematics at the University of Bristol, being promoted Reader in 1954; he became Professor of Applied Mathematics at the University of Durham in 1958, and took up the Chair at University College in 1964. Shorty afterwards, in March 1965, he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. He was awarded the Honorary Degree of D.Sc. by the University of East Anglia in 1979.

Keith Stewartson's abiding passion in mathematical research lay in the solution of the equations governing the motion of liquids and gases, and in the comparison of his theoretical predictions with experiment and observation. He made penetrating discoveries in the dynamics of the aerodynamical boundary layer, leading to the concept known as the triple-deck, by means of which zones of fluid flow are delineated and their calculation made tractable.

Our present knowledge of "separation" of the boundary layer, a phenomenon which is of crucial importance in determining the drag of aircraft in flight and which occurs throughout nature, owes much to the insight which he showed in his mathematical studies. His Von Neumann Lecture of 1980, given before the American Society for Industrial and Applied Mathematics, dealt brilliantly with this topic under the title of "d'Alembert's Paradox". In 1971 he turned his attention to the related and difficult problem of the early stages of the transition process by which smooth (laminar) flow becomes turbulent, a phenomenon again of central relevance for the magnitude of aircraft drag and also of importance in geophysical and physiological flows. He made striking theoretical progress here, too.

His other major theoretical activity lay in the mathematical description of the dynamics of rotating fluids, whether on the scale of planetary atmospheres, or in laboratory experiments, or for the case of a rotating projectile containing liquid. The "Stewartson layer", for example, is now a "household name" with research workers in rotating-fluid dynamics.

The universality of Stewartson's mathmatical ideas, and their relevance to both scientific experiment and to engineering practice, led to his being frequently consulted by scientific and engineering research laboratories and by aircraft manufacturers. He acted as a powerful scientific stimulus and visitors regularly came to his Department from the United States, the USSR, Australia, Canada, Israel, Holland and elsewhere.

He himself travelled widely, lecturing and collaborating on research projects abroad. His stature in Applied Mathematics may stand comparison with those applied-mathematical giants of the past, Sir George Stokes, Lord Kelvin and Lord Rayleigh. In addition to research he was strongly devoted to other academic matters. Within the Department of Mathematics at University College, he was much concerned for the welfare and progress of every kind of student and of the staff.

The hospitality of Stewartson and his wife was legendary, and his happy, generous personality, coupled with his staunch support of those conducting good research and teaching, made him one of the most widely loved and revered of mathematicians.

He is survived by his wife Jean, whom he married in 1953, and by their two sons and one daughter.

MGR ETIENNE LAMOTTE

Mgr Etienne Lamotte, the renowned Belgian Buddhist scholar and Emeritus Professor of the Catholic University of Louvain, died in Brussels on May 5 at the age of 79.

An ordained priest who was to rise to the rank of Prelate of the Pope's Household, he decided at an early age to devote himself to oriental studies. After taking courses in classical philology and theology, he studied oriental languages in Rome, Paris and Louvain. Under the influence of the great Belgian orientalist, Louis de La Vallée Poussin, he specialized in the study and translation of Indian Buddhist texts only extant in Chinese or Tibetan.

From his pen (all his works were submitted handwritten for publication) came such masterpieces as La Somme du Grand Véhicule d'Asanga (Mahāyānasamgraha); L'Enseignement de Vimalakīrti (Vimalakīrtinirdeśa); La Concentration de la Marche Héroïque (Śūramgamasamādhisūtra), all objectively and scrupulously translated and annotated. His greatest contributions to Buddhist studies were undoubtedly L'Histoire du Bouddhisme Indien and the five-volume annotated translation of the great Prajñāpāramitā treatise, Le Traité de la Grande Vertu de Sagesse de Nāgārjuna. He also contributed many lucid articles and reviews to international journals in the field.

Assigned to Louvain University in 1932, Lamotte taught classical philology, Chinese, Tibetan, Sanskrit and Indology, in 1959 dropping classical philology and adding Pāli and the comparative grammar of the Indo-European languages, until his retirement in 1974. He took part in conferences in Italy, Britain, Germany and Japan.

He received many international honours, ecclesiastic, academic and civil. He was an Honorary Fellow of the Royal Asiatic Society, Corresponding Fellow of the British Academy, and Corresponding Member of the School of Oriental and African Studies in London. He was a grand Officier de l'ordre de Léopold and of the Ordre de la Couronne (Belgium), and Commandeur de l'Ordre de Palmes Académiques (France).

As a person, he was extremely modest, humble even, but his warmth, helpfulness and sense of humour will long be remembered by his pupils, colleagues and friends. His mastery of so many oriental languages and his penetrating comparative overview of the various Buddhist schools produced many fruitful results. Indianisme et Bouddhisme, a collection in his honour, was published in 1980.

Major-General J. F. D. Steedman, CMG, CBE, MC, Civil Engineer XII Army 1944-46, and Engineer-in-Chief, Dominion of India 1947, died on May 14, aged 85.

Professor J. M. T. Charlton, former Professor of Classics at the University of Keele and, since 1982, Professor Emeritus, died on May 9.

WALL STREET

Shares turn mixed

New York (AP-Dow Jones)-Stocks turned mixed again yesterday after making a small gain throughout most of the morning.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell about 11 points, while advancing issues were nearly four-to-three ahead of declines. Trading was moderate.

General Electric fell 1 to 108½; International Business Machines fell ⅞ to 114⅜; General Motors fell ⅜ to 69⅛; Eastman Kodak was unchanged at 74⅛; Howell was down 1½ to 120½ and American Express fell ⅛ to 66¾.

Texaco at 35¼ was up ⅛; Monsanto at 82¾ was up 1⅛; Warner Lambert at 31¼ was up ⅜; Standard Oil of Ohio at 48⅛ was down ½; PPG Industries at 63⅞ was down ⅛; AMR at 26½ was down 1½; Union Pacific at 56⅞ was down ⅛; Polaroid at 31⅞ was up ¼; Lockheed at 115¼ was up 1¾; and J. C. Penney at 58⅞ was down 1.

Mr Robert Mintz, research vice-president at Philips Appel and Walden said: "A lot of nervous investors are confused because the market had come this far without a major correction. In this atmoshere people look for an excuse for a correction as shown by Monday's drop."

There was, "undue concern", Mr Mintz said, over interest rates and the possible resurgence of inflation.

Overseas problems for Lloyds

By Michael Prest

Lloyds Bank International demonstrated clearly yesterday that international debt problems are far from over. It revealed that provisions for bad and doubtful debts in its interim results had doubled to £70.6m from the same period last year. But pretax profits rose from £67.4m to £70.3m.

Worries about debt difficulties will not be eased by reports yesterday that the Bank for International Settlements has decided to stop making bridging loans. The BIS stressed, however, that the terms of existing loans may be open to discussion.

The BIS policy narrows the choices open to banks trying to thrash out the details of interbank credits for Brazil. Bankers are meeting in New York and Señor Carlos Langoni, the director of Brazil's central bank, is expected in both New York and Washington, where he will meet International Monetary Fund officials, this week.

In London there are hopes that a compromise can be reached between the banks themselves and between the banks and Nigeria over refinancing up to $2,000m of the country's short-term trade credits.

Mr Alhaji Abubakar Alhaji, Nigeria's chief negotiator, said yesterday that talks on Monday had been constructive. So far about half the 23 banks involved in the talks have accepted the plan

Lloyd's Bank International, which is wholly-owned by Lloyds Bank, is a big lender to Latin America, which includes some of the world's biggest debtor countries. Provisions for the six months to the end of September were £81.3m. But the latest provisions for the half year to March 31 have been more than offset by rising profits.

The bank has benefited from falling interest rates which reduced its cost of funds while borrowers from the bank were still paying higher rates. So interest income was £956m, compared with £974m in the preceding half, but interest charges fell by £42.9m to £802m.

This generated the higher profit and has enabled the banks to pay its parent a dividend of £20m after declaring no dividend at all last year.

Offer 'still totally unacceptable', says Sir Patrick Meaney

BTR raises record takeover bid for Thomas Tilling to £664m

By Our Financial Staff

BTR yesterday increased its bid for Thomas Tilling to £664m, making Britain's biggest takeover bid still bigger.

Sir David Nicholson, BTR chairman, emphasized that this was the company's final offer. But Sir Patrick Meaney, Thomas Tilling managing director, said that he and his fellow directors regarded the bid as "still totally unacceptable".

The increased offer was announced early yesterday morning and BTR's advisers Morgan Grenfell took the opportunity of staging a "dawn raid" for Tilling shares in the market at the new offer price.

It is believed that they picked up about 8 per cent, or over 24 million shares, bringing the BTR camp's total stake in Tilling to about 22 per cent. To do so they spent £55m.

The terms of the new offer are 11 BTR shares for every 20 Tilling shares, valuing Tilling at about 228p. This slipped to 226p with BTR shares falling several pence when the offer was announced.

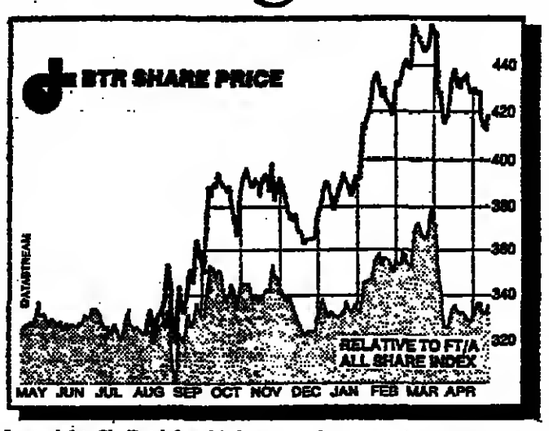
But more important in terms of the final outcome, BTR has raised its cash alternative from 185p a share to 225p a share. In uncertain stock market conditions in the run-up to the election, this is more likely to impress both institutional and small shareholders.

BTR's final offer – to which it is committed under the rules of the Takeover Panel unless a third party intervenes – has just three weeks to run. If it does not succeed in that time ti will be allowed to lapse.

And Tilling, backed by advisers S. G. Warburg has only that amount of time to mount a defence against what the City regarded as a realistic offer.

BTR's bid has already received clearance from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Tilling is considering hiving off some of its component companies as part of its defence.



Last night, Sir Patrick said that he did not rule out floating off companies in North America, and that Goldman Sachs, the US banking house, was examining various possibilities.

With little chance of any counterbid from Britain, both sides in this increasingly acrimonious battle are casting nervous eyes across the Atlantic.

A Morgan Grenfell spokesman confirmed yesterday that it had enlisted the aid of Morgan Stanley in New York to assess the danger of a possible US intervention.

According to the London Spokesman, the British bank had been advised that any full counterbid from the US was unlikely ahead of the general election. "No major US group is going to risk a bid running into more than $1bn in the UK in the present atmosphere of electoral uncertainty," he said.

BTR has renegotiated the previous underwriting of its cash alternative on the same terms as its original, in spite of the fall in its market price from about 460p to about 412p.

However, any increase in cash – which could amount to as much as £219m – as a result of the new bid would be found from BTR's own resources.

The company and its advisers say they are confident that this is unlikely to be required, since they believe that most accepting shareholders would go for the share-exchange alternative.

Last night Sir Patrick, for Tilling, said that there would be "no problems" in defending this latest offer. "We have got plenty of ammunition left."

Recovery falters as output falls 1pc

By Frances Williams, Economics Correspondent

The pace of industrial recovery faltered in March, according to the last set of figures to be published before the general election, disappointing government hopes that they would demonstrate convincingly that the economic upswing was well underway.

The output of British industry as a whole fell 0.9 per cent in March after a 1 per cent jump in February mainly due to lower gas, electricity and oil production as the weather returned to normal after the February cold spell.

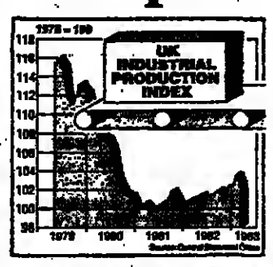
Manufacturing production slipped by 0.2 per cent in March after a 1.4 per cent drop the previous month from high January levels.

Monthly figures are, however, notoriously erratic. Figures for the latest three months, a better guide to the underlying trend, show total output 1.5 per cent up on the final quarter of last year and 2 per cent higher than the year before.

The Central Statistical Office said yesterday that, allowing for changes in stocks, industrial output was now 3.5 per cent above the trough of the recession in spring 1981. But practically the whole of this improvement comes from the sharp rise in North Sea oil and gas extraction.

Excluding the North Sea sector, industrial output rose by 1.5 per cent between the latest three-month periods, but is only 0.5 per cent up on its level of a year ago.

For manufacturing the picture is more dismal. Despite a 1.5 per cent rise in the most recent quarter, British factories are producing 0.5 per cent less than they were at the same time last year.



The March figures brought sharply differing reactions from the two sides of industry. The Confederation of British Industry – whose recent company surveys have revealed growing optimism on future production and orders – said the trend for manufacturing industry was still upwards, "very much in line with the CBI forecasts".

But Mr Len Murray, general secretary of the TUC, said the figures "gave the lie to all the exaggerated and over-optimistic claims about an industrial and economic recovery."

Most forecasters, including the Treasury, are expecting industrial activity to go on rising, albeit at a modest pace, over the coming months.

But on present trends it will take several years to regain the 11.6 per cent loss of total production, and the 18.5 per cent slump in manufacturing output, suffered since the Government took office

Manxmen aim for confidence

By David Young

The Isle of Man government has announced its satisfaction with a strengthened Treasury team and that is to introduce legislation to control its financial institutions.

Dr Edgar Mann, the chairman of the Isle of Man Finance Board, said in his annual Budget speech yesterday that there had been a surge of new funds to the island's banks, with deposits rising by 34.5 per cent during the past year.

The Manx government will move towards the introduction of a freeport area and the introduction of an Exempt Companies Bill to cover offshore business carried out on the island. The possibility of introducing legislation to cover confidentiality in financial transactions is being studied, Dr Mann said.

Stung by the Bank of England's report into the collapse of the island's Savings and Investment Bank, the Manx Government has spent the past year restoring confidence in the islands financial reputation, he added.

The Manx Government is also considering the setting-up of a Man Securities Market as a stimulus to the development

However, the repercussions of the collapse of the SIB are still being felt on the island and a meeting of the depositors of the ill-fated bank is due to be held before the end of the month, when calls for a wind-fall profit tax on the island's other banks to cover the SIB debts will be renewed.

£4.5m cash call by Smith Brothers

By Michael Clark

The recent boom in the stock market has left Smith Bros, the smaller of he two publicly quoted jobbers, with record profits but a little short of cash. As a result, the group plans to raise £4.5m, virtually doubling its capital base.

Shareholders are being asked to take up an extra 3.4 million shares on the basis of two new shares for every five held at 50p to raise £1.6m. Smith will be placing 750,000 shares at 50p and £2.5m of 11 per cent partly convertible subordinated capital with Finance for Industry.

If FFI decides to exercise is full conversion rights, it will hold 18.4 per cent of Smith's enlarged equity.

Mr Tony Lewis, chairman of Smith Bros, who spent several months putting the deal together, said: "Our whole business has got bigger with the higher level of market turnover. We want to be part of the real action."

News of the rights issue caught the rest of the market on the bop, but the forecast of pretax profits of £3.3m against a loss last year of £28,000 was mainly responsible for shares closing unchanged at 49p. This values the group on the enlarged capital at £6.35m.

The New York venture is expected to appear on the books valued at around $4m (2.5).

General Accident recovers

By Jonathan Clare

General Accident, Britain's biggest motor insurer, has made a substantial recovery from last year's disastrous first quarter loss of £11.4m, but prospects in Britain remain grim with only weak recovery in the United States.

Much of the first quarter turnround to profits of £8.9m is attributable to the absence of severe weather claims. But drivers are travelling further on relatively cheap petrol with the result that motor insurance claims have risen significantly. Therefore, rate rises are certain later this year.

United Kingdom commercial business remains competitive, though there are some signs of improvement.

General Accident
First quarter to 31.3.83
Pretax profit £8.9m (Loss £11.4m)
Underwriting loss £40m (£56.2m)
Written premiums £342.1m (£298.9m)
Share price 423p, unchanged.

The worldwide underwriting loss has been reduced from £56.2m to £40m and should be down further by the year end. The underwriting loss in Britain was reduced from £27.7m to £19.3m.

Investment income has declined and cash flow has been hit by heavy claims payments

P & O in Trafalgar's sights

If Trafalgar House is not planning to bid for P & O next week then it is going to disappoint a lot of people in the stock market.

Yesterday the construction to shipping group was said to be in the market again for P & O shares, in an attempt to build up a strategic stake from which to launch an offer. So far, however it has not confirmed this and has given no indication that its holding is approaching 5 per cent.

Not surprisingly though, after the report of Trafalgar's interest in The Times yesterday, P & O shares were a firm market, rising a further 10p to 164p. If, as expected, Trafalgar's opening shot is around 200p then the value of the offer for P & O would be just short of £300m.

Trafalgar has made no secret recently of wanting to lighten its interest in property – not least because the London office market is not what it was. Buildings which five years ago would have been snapped up before the "To Let" signs appeared, are today staying empty, a drag onthe market and on profits.

Linking with P & O would also make considerable commercial sense, as the two groups have much in common, although the latter might not be expected to see it that way. But P & O is not the force it was, in spite of valiant efforts to recover in recent years and it might find it as hard as Thomas Tilling to fight off a determined predator with a good track record.

The unions, too, might resist as much as P & O, because Trafalgar has slashed the size of its Cunard fleet in the last two years, in an effort to cope with the recession.

In normal times such a bid might seem a natural for the Monopolies Commission to investigate, but with election fever in Whitehall these are not normal times.

So the strategists at Trafalgar probably feel that if they are going to bid – and – and they must be tempted – then they will never get a better chance than now. Sll in all, it promises to be an interesting 10 days.

Wearwell profits soar 44pc

By Jeremy Warner

Wearwell
Half-year to 4.3.83.
Pretax profit £2.47m (£1.72m).
Stated earnings 3.6p (3.3p).
Turnover £13.87m (£9.56m).
Net Final dividend 1.32p (1.2p).
Share price 65p unchanged.

Wearwell, one of the three publicly quoted companies run by Mr Asil Nadir, chairman of Polly Peck, whose shares crashed in March, yesterday reported a 44 per cent rise in half year pretax profits.

The company, the only one in the Nadir stable that can claim to have stuck to the clothing business, announced that profits in the six months to March 3 rose to £2.5m.

The figures were accompanied by a statement saying the company, which already has production facilities in the Turkish section of Cyprus, is planning new capacity in mainland Turkey.

Mersey Docks back in black

By Jonathan Davis

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Company, which was given £35.5m of Government grants last year to pay for the redundancy of half its workforce, has finally started to trade in the black again after four years of losses.

Announcing a 1982 trading loss of £9.5m, Sir John Page, the chairman, said the company – which has been badly hit by the decline of Liverpool as a port – made a trading profit in the first quarter of this year. The situation, however, remained "precarious".

Some 1800 dockers and other employees, took voluntary redundancy last year, reducing the workforce to 1,700. The severence costs of £35.5m, equivalent to more than 60 per cent of the company's annual revenue, were met by repayable government grants.

The Government also wrote off £30m in outstanding debts.

Paper offer for troubled games maker

£10.5m play for Waddington

By Derek Harris, Commercial Editor

John Waddington, best known as a manufacturer of Monopoly, Cluedo and other games, yesterday attracted a paper bid from another Leeds-based company, Norton & Wright. At last night's closing Norton price, the bid was worth around £10.5m.

Norton & Wright, which is being renamed Norton Opax, has been a big producer of lottery tickets but, since a management shake-up and return to profits, has been growing through acquisition. It has also been moving into the games sector. It has spent around £1m in half a dozen acquisitions for cash.

Norton, which in turnover and assets is smaller than Waddington, is offering eight Norton shares for every five of Waddington. Samuel Montagu is underwriting the share issue with a cash alternative if the offer becomes unconditional, clearly backing what it believes is a good management team.

After the bid announcement, Norton's share price – unusually for a bidder – rose 15p to 108p, adding substantially to the value of the shares offer. Waddington rose to 160p from the overnight 116p.

Waddington, two thirds of whose business is in printing and packaging, has had two years of losses with a further loss feared for the past financial year ended in March. But after a prolonged cost-cutting programme, Mr Victor Watson, the the chairman, was looking to a return to profits in 1983-84.

In the last full year, Waddington made a pretax loss of £326,000 on sales of more than £44m. There were pretax losses of £271,000 in the following first half.

Waddington's table games business has been hit by the development of electronic and computer games. Its own venture into electronic games has not been successful.

But Mr Richard Hanwell, Norton's chief executive, said yesterday that the Waddington games would be an asset which would fit into development plans for Norton's lotteries division.

Waddington's packaging would be a departure for Norton, but Mr Hanwell – an accountant who has himself had packaging company experience – said: "There are strengths in the Waddington business and we want to exploit them by motivating the enormous bank of skills that exist at Waddington."

Some factory rationalization is possible but no big effect on either company's workforce is foreseen.

For Waddington, the Norton announcement cleared up the identity of the mystery bidder for its shares. Norton had acquired 3.1 per cent of Waddington shares at prices from 94p to 96p.

Taylor Woodrow looks to the future with confidence

Mr. Dick Puttick, Chairman, reports

Trading conditions throughout the year were not easy, intense competition being experienced for new work as it became available. However, despite these conditions, which have been with us for some years now, we increased our profit for the twenty-second successive year. In the light of present trading conditions I believe that once again the results are not unsatisfactory. We look to the future with confidence and are well equipped to meet the challenges that lie ahead as recovery comes from the present recession in our industry.

The year in brief

	1982	1981
● Turnover	£605m	£575m
● Profit before tax	£28.53m	£24.87m
● Profit available to Taylor Woodrow plc	£17.51m	£20.64m
● Earnings per share before extraordinary items	54.7p	49.7p
Fully diluted	53.4p	48.3p
● Net dividends per share	19.5p	16.3p

The increased profit before taxation is derived from the group's share of associated companies' results and geographically the improvement in profit is seen to be mainly in the Americas and the Far East. Substantial progress has been made on the contract in Trinidad and this is reflected in the results for the Americas. We earned gross rents of almost £18 million in 1982 which shows the importance of our property investment activities.

The properties of the group were independently valued at the end of 1982 at £215 million, of which £173 million is in investment properties. After deduction of minority interests the surplus on valuation amounting to £39 million has been credited to capital reserves.

The group continued to have a positive cash flow in 1982 of nearly £4 million and we ended the year with liquid funds standing at £58 million. Shareholders' funds now total £272 million which equals 921p per share.

The board has great belief in free enterprise for the creation of wealth and is an active supporter of organisations concerned with these principles. With a General Election not far away we shall apply our efforts towards ensuring the re-election to government of the Conservatives whom we see as the only party dedicated to the support of free enterprise, industry and commerce and the encouragement of private initiative in business.

Despite the difficult economic circumstances of the past few years we have maintained our efforts through the principles of free enterprise to create wealth and to play our part in helping the country to improve the quality of life here and overseas. We have built hospitals, homes, factories, officea, irrigation schemes for food production and most forms of energy generation. We have earned valuable foreign currency from our activities throughout the world and we have re-invested profits in research to innovate and improve techniques so that we can continue this vital role.

Our teams of men and women throughout the world, whom we thank, remain in good heart and are working well, mseting the challenges of these somewhat difficult times.

Thanks are due to our many clients who have entrusted us with their work and to those whose co-operation and assistance enabled us to carry it out.

Amos Hinton down a fifth

By Victor Felstead

Amos Hinton & Sons
Year to 5.3.83.
Pretax profit, £2m (£2.49m).
Stated earnings, 31.69p (40.53p).
Turnover, £112.87m (£101.3m).
Net dividend, 8.0p (8.0p).

In spite of an 11 per cent expansioo in sales to £112.87m, pretax profits of Amos Hinton & Sons, the supermarkets and off-licence group, fell by almost a fifth to £2m in the year to March 5, 1983.

Profits were arrived at after heavier depreciation of £1.39m, against £1.09m, and an interest charge of £2,000, compared with the previous year's credit of £303,000.

The tax charge is almost unchanged at £263,000 (266,000), and there is an extraordinary debit of £244,000, against a credit of £32,000 last time.

The results is that earnings per share have slumped from 40.53p to 31.69p. However, net assets per share are up from 196p to 215p. Shareholders collect an unchanged total dividend of 11.42p gross a share.

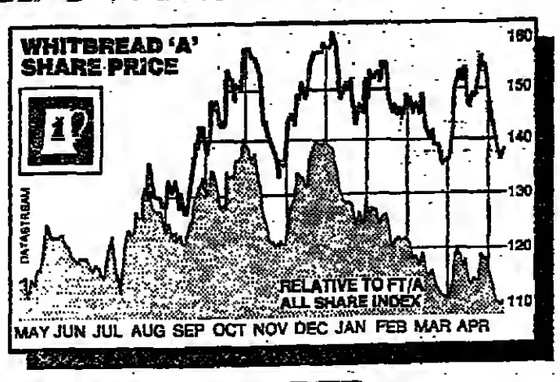
INVESTORS' NOTEBOOK ● edited by Sandy McLachlan

City frowns on Whitbread's £81m

Whitbread & Co
Year to 26-2-83
Pretax profit £81m (£73.3m)
Stated earnings 14.13p (14.34p)
Turnover £1,001.9m (£841.7m)
Net final dividend 3.75p making 5.4p
Share price 134p down 4p Yield 5.8%



Whitbread managed to finish the year with its pretax profits 10.5 per ceot ahead at £81m. This was despite a further 3 per cent fall in beer vnlume and the end of the cash flow from the Chiswell Street property development which, for years limited interest payments.

The market nevertheless took a dim view of the figures anó marked down the shares, which since the half-year stage have underperformed both the FT Iodex and the sector, by a further 4p to 134p.

Though the outlook for the sector is by no means bunyant, with another summer of poor weather widely expected, the underperfornance is probably unwarranted. Grand Metropolitan, for instace, showed no increase in the trading profits of its brewing divisinn Watney Mann in the half year to last March.

Whitbread has continued tn benefit from its cost-cutting programme and if the company is to be believed, that impact will be carried over intn 1983 when a 20 per cent increase in internal capital spending is planned. Julius Wile, the recent American acquisition, made a "small contributinn" after financing costs and is expected to do better this year.

The Beefeater chaio of restaurants – there are 137 after 40 openings last year – is said to have chipped io a "material" amount for the first time. As the proportion of Beefeater revenue absorbed by pre-opening expenses declines, profits will come through more strongly.

The worry is that Whitbread's determination to claw back the market share it lost last year will eat deep into margins. Whitbread delayed making price increases for longer than nther brewers and when they did come through in September, they were smaller

According to Whitbread, which is already benefiting from the resumption of growth in the lager market where it has a higher than average exposure, this is having the required effect with volume slightly ahead of the industry so far this year.

Assuming the imact of cost-cutting is still coming through, the effect of margins should not be too severe.

BTR

BTR has takeo a considerable gamble with its all-or-nothing increase in its bid for Thomas Tilling, but it is probably the right tactic. By limiting the timescale of the bid to three weeks it has cramped leisurely defensive moves.

Mnreover, it is a Hanson-style preemptive bid. The market value of the paper offer is of little significance in preelection jittery conditions (today the paper offer is worth about 226p a share, but it would have been worth 253p a share on the BTR price before the initial bid for Tilling).

However, there is nothing the opposition can say about a solid cash alternative of 225p a share against the original 185p cash alternative.

Normally the rise in the Tilling price to above the new bid would indicate hopes of further developments. At the moment that is not the case: Tilling's shares are firm at 230p because BTR's advisers, Morgan Grenfell, are in the market for as many shares as they can get at 229.5p. The extra over the cash alternative represents the dividend which is still included in the Tilling shares.

The gambling element comes in because Tilling has a higher-than-average proportion of small shareholders, and three weeks is a short time to overcome both opposition and apathy.

Nevertheless, most of the 60 per cent majority of shares held by institutions is likely to go BTR's way – either through the market, or in acceptances of this final offer, depending on whether they want cash or shares.

The odds are now on a BTR win. The best investment advice is to sell Tilling in the market, unless tax considerations are in favour of accepting paper. Certainly, if the bid fails, Tilling shares will fall sharply.

Juliana's

There is no company quoted oo the stock market comparable to Juliana's, which helps to explain why Morgan Grenfell has chosen the tender method of offering 1.35 millinn of its shares, or 25 per cent of the total, for sale to the public. According to Grenfell, the floor on which to price the issue was easy to establish but the ceiling was almost impossible.

Juliana's "is nn ordinary experience" according to the anonymous mid-Atlantic accent that accompanies its promotional video. It is a company that provides a range of discotheque entertainment services to 112 night clubs and hotels, and that, for the Stock Exchange where its shares will start trading for the first time on June 1, makes it a "positively unique experience."

The floor price (no pun intended) in this case is a minimum tender of 225p per share. That puts the shares on 15.7 times prospective 1983 earnings after an actual tax charge and 24.6 on a full tax charge plus prospective yield of 3.2 per ceot – this for a company with minimal asset backing. In turn, that means a £12.4m capitalizatioo and proof that discos are not cheap.

There will undoubtedly be something for the stags: but it must be remembered that discos can be compared with other fashion stocks, which leaves longer term question marks over the rating.

Hot on the heels of Grand Metropolitan's interim figures comes to the announcement that its Watney Mann and Truman subsidiary is placing a £50m debenture stock. Yesterday we did GrandMet a disservice by crediting below-the-line currency appreciation figures and other extra-ordinary items to the group's pretax profit figure. The pretax profit printed wos correct, but obviously the fact that these extraordinary items were not included in it means that GrandMet's quality of earnings is enhanced. This can only make our bullish view of the shares more pronounced.

Frances Williams explains why sluggish growth is good news

Punishing interest rates keep US recovery smouldering

The United States is expected to stage a distinctly anaemic economic recovery this year.

The admistration is predicting growth of 4.7 per cent over the course of 1983, comfortably withio the 4 per cent to 5 per cent consensus of most outside forecasters. This compares with increases of 6 per cent or 7 per ceot typical of previous post-war recoveries.

Yet far from finding this disconcerting, those charged with the management of the American economy are rubbing their hands with quiet satisfaction. They positively want a slow recovery and they hope it will continue that way.

Too rapid growth, they argue, would run the risk of triggering a fresh bout of inflation, forcing the authorities to bring the upturn to an untimely end. More immediately, it would threateo a sharp rise in interest rates as heavy borrowing by companies to finance stocks and investment would clash with the huge credit demaods of the Governmeot.

Economie iodicators published in the last week or so suggesting the upswing may be stronger that predicted have thus been greeted with some dismay.

As it is, administratioo and centtral bank officials believe 4 per ceot to 5 per cent growth is compatible, at Least over the next few months, with a firther fall in inflation from the present 3½ per cent, some modest drop in ioterest rates and a gradual reduction io unemployment, now 10.2 per cent of the workforce.

The view that slow recovery is both more substainable and less risky than faster growth is not universally shared outside governmeot. Many fear the Americao economy will lose momentum before any significant inroads have been made io the jobless total.

With industry operatiog so far below full capacity, they believe, slow growth will not be sufficient to induce companies to invest io new plant and equipment while continuing high unemployment will dampen consumer spending, bringing the upturn spluttering so a halt.

All sides agree, however, that at the root of the sluggish rise in activity lies the chillingly high level of United Sates interest rates, for which the massive and growing federal budget deficit is held chiefly responsible.

From the deficit of $58,000m in 1981, President Reagan's first year in office, the budget gap has quadrupled to ao estimated $210,000m io the curreot fiscal year, with deficits of $200,000m-plus projected, oo present policies, "as far as the eye can see". This would lead to a doubling of the oational debt withio five years.

It is not the deficits this year and oext that cause most concern. Without them the recovery would be even more feeble than it is. It is that, with Congress and the President still deadlocked over the Budget, there seems oo prospect of lower deficits two years out and more, when recovery should be well under way.

Fears of the resulting credit cruoch have kept long-term interest rates at punitively high levels despite the deep recession.

This has depressed iovestment. And, by pushing up the value of the dollar to grossly uncompetitive levels, it has hurt exports and ensured that much of the benefit of higher home demand is syphoned abroad as imports are sucked in.

Administration economists reckoo that the worsening trade balance, expected to be in the red to the tune of some $25,000m this year, will alone knock ½ per cent to 1 per cent off US growth in 1983.

The result is a lop-sided recovery based primarily on higher government spending oo defence and social security, some rise in consumer speoding and a reductioo in the rate of destocking.

Io the past, a sub-normal upswing io the United States would cause considerale heartache to the rest of the world, which has traditionally relied on this giant econnmy to stoke the eogioes of global activity. Times have changed.

World growth prospects oow depend at least as much, if oot more, oo what happens to US ioterest rates and the dollar as they do on US growth.

Recovery io ooe country transmits itself to the rest of the world through trade. The US remains the world's biggest single trading nation. But Germany and Japan together, are even more important. And the European Community as a whole does more than twice as much trade as the US.

Expansion in Europe and Japan, however, is being inhibited by high American interest rates and the stroog dollar, which has forced couotries to adopt tight mooey policies to stem capital outflows and limit the inflationary consequences of their falling currencies. The Organizaoon for Economic Cooperaoon and Development recently calculated that a 10 per cent depreciatioo of the dollar, accompanied by n cut of 2 percentage points in interest rates in the industrial countries, would boost OECD output by more than 1 per cent.

This compares with a boost to OECD output of ¼ per cent or less for every 1 per cent growth in the US.

Equally important is the expanding role of developing countries in the world economy, and its iocreasing interdependence. Two-thirds of Third World exports (including those of the Organisation of Petroleum Exportiog Countries) go to the industrial couotries. One-quarter of OECD exports go the the poorer oatinos.

Growth of 1 per ceot io the developing countries thus adds ¼ per ceot to activity in the industrialized world, rivalling the impact of the American economy in driving or depressing international recovery.

Indeed, the potential impact of developing countries is far greater. In the 1970's their economies grew oearly twice as fast as the 3 per cent a year registered by the US. That is likely to be repeated if world recovery takes hold. The economic troubles of the Third World will this year cost the US itself perhaps 1 per cent growth, according to official estimates.

The most dynamie of the developing countries are now heavily, sometimes dangerously, in debt: the total is more than $700,000m. Much of this is denominated and serviced in dollars.

Each 1 per cent drop in US interest rates is reckooed to wipe $4,000m off annual debt-servicing costs, while a fall in the dollar would make repayments easier to meet from export earnings, which are often in ooo-dollar currencies.

It would also ease the pressure for protectiooism io the US which threaten to cut off vital export markets for many third world countries.

Reductioo in the debt servicing burden is crucial if debtor couotries are to expand their imports from the rich countries and renew the rapid economie growth which austerity measures, forced on them by world recessioo and the debt crisis, have brought abruptly to a halt.

Any rise in American interest rates could prove disastrous for growth in the Third World, with dismal repercussions in the West.

In the short term, then, while the American budget deficit problem remains unresolved, the world as well as US has an ioterest in ensuring that the smoulderiog American recovery does not catch fire.

In the longer term, as western leaders meeting shortly io Williamshurg will impress forcibly upon Presient Reagan, failure to put the deficit on a credibly declining path will shipwreck any recovery, modest or otherwise, in the US and the rest of the world.

Spark of life from a smaller industry

While British industry has been bemoaning in the last few years the lack nf Government support for its endeavours hy way of cuts in their costs, many companies can point tn positive actioo hy Whitehall to save them from the scrap heap or tn help them fend off foreign competition.

The big headline hitters like the British Steel Corporation and BL are, quite rightly, nf pohlic concern because of the hefty financial props jammed in place hy successive governments.

The industrial commonity rarely has the opportunity to hear in detail nf the smaller, less glamorous attempts being made to prevent further erosinn of the manufacturing base. It is rare indeed fnr ao industrialist tn sing the praises of the civil servants; mnre ofteo they prefer to take the money and keep their mouths shut.

A refreshing excepdon is the American-owned Champion Sparking Plog Company, oow based at Upton on the Wirral in badly depressed Merseyside. It has recently embarked on an iovestment programme costing £6m, of which £1m has been donated by the Department of Industry in various forms of assistance, including regional development grants and Industry Act selective financial assistance.

Champioo's decisioo was made only after the DoI stumped up the cash According to Mr David Wilkie, the United Kingdom managing director, it is "truly an example of a development that wnuld oot have proceeded withoot government financial assistance."

Mr Wilkie remembers an eotirely reversed situation in 1977 wheo Champioo was keen to site its new windscreen wiper hlade manufacturing facility in Britain. "At that time the DoI did nothing to help us and the result was that we lost the factory to Belgium." he said.

This time, the Americao parent was understandably reticent to invest in a country where it had previnusly been snnhbed. Bot again, according to Mr Wilkie, the department pulled out the stnps, visited the Americans to convince them that the Wirrl was a good base for their European activities and in geoeral joined forces with the United Kingdom management to promote the development.

While the investment may have created only a coople of huodred jobs in the longer term, Champion has oow made Britain self-sufficient io sparking plugs – no mean feat at a time of appalling depression in motor components – has safeguarded mnre than 1,000 jobs and completed a successful import substitutioo job.

Champion UK is now huilding up to a productioo rate of 1 million ceramic insulatnrs n day and assembliog 240,000 plugs a day. It exports insolators to Belgium. This, combined with an enviahle industrial relations record and Mr Wilkie's tough but fair management, clearly fanned the department's desire to back a winner.

It was also sufficient to persuade Mr Patrick Jenkin, Industry Secretary, to visit the Upton factory recently and lay one of the bricks in the new kiln that he and the taxpayers have helped to provide.

The Upton investmeot shows what cao be done wheo local management is convinced nf the practicality of a scheme and can coovey that enthusiasm tn Whitehall. It is also a welcome example of investment in the North after elosure, in the prosperous Sooth-east (Champion closed its plant at Feltham in Middlesex) rather than vice versa.

The Champion experience needs to be folly documeoted, like many others, without giving away business secrets, if ooly to demonstrate tn the mass of ignorant small businesses what is available from the state, and how to go about gettiog it.

The department, nnder its self-created cloak of "commercial coofidentiality", sadly is oot prepared to discuss individnal cases. Open industry as well as open government is snrely needed.

Since May, 1979, when the present Government came to power, £197m has been dispensed under Section 7 of what is now called the Industrial Development Act, and £1,984m in regional development grants. We know the reginns aod the industries that have mnpped np the mooey, hut we do nnt know the individnal recipients. They shoold be encouraged tn tell.

Recovery signs in South-east

By Derek Harris, Commercial Editor

There are signs of recovery in manufacturing and the service todustries in Londoo and the South-east, according to a survey by the Loodon Chamber of Commerce and Industry. But the report says: "It would be rash to conclude that this amounts to a genuine and sustained economic recovery."

In the past four months there have been improvements in domestie and export orders, to production levels and in investment intentions, it says.

Nevertheless, unemployment seems set to increase. Output prices are also rising amoog large companies, which appear to be improving their profit margins.

The survey appears to show that the setback late last year to the recovery which started in December 1981 was only temporary. Domestic orders, for instance, are now slightly above the December 1981 level.

But the benefit so far has gone to large and small companies, not to medium-sized ones. Only mechanical engineering among sectors has oot reported distinct improvements.

About 42 per cent of companies report domestic order increases compared with 37 per cent at the beginning of the year. On export orders, 31 per cent of companies reported improvements compared with 21.4 per cent io the previous survey

Production is also up. About 37 per ceot of companies reported increased levels with 18 per cent showing a fall. Investment plans generally are on the upturn, with 30.5 per ceot of companies intending to increase spending, an increase of 7 per cent in the past four months.

Among sectors, produetion levels have shown large increases in the chemical industry, electrical engineering and rubber and plastics, with little change in mechanical engineering.

Only skilled workers have benefited from the production increases with additiooal overtime reported and a significant number of employers saying they intend to recruit.

THREE-MONTHS' RESULTS

The results for the three months ended 31st March, 1983, estimated and subject to audit, are compared below with those for the similar period in 1982, which are restated at 31st December, 1982, rates of exchange; also shown are the actual results for the full year 1982.

It must be emphasised that the results for the interim period do not necessarily provide a reliable indication of those for the full year.

Net written premiums and investment income increased in sterling terms by 14.5% and 9.3% respectively. Adjusted to exclude the effects of currency fluctuations the increases were 9.7% and 4.5% respectively.

In the United Kingdom, net written premiums were £125.3m (1982 £113.4m) and there was an underwriting loss of £19.3m (1982 £27.7m). Weather losses were much less than in the comparable quarter last year. This benefit was mainly reflected in the Homeowners and Commercial Property accounts which nonetheless reported underwriting losses of £3.7m (1982 £10.2m loss) and £5.4m (1982 £9.0m loss) respectively. The Motor account produced a loss of £8.1m (1982 £7.2m loss) reflecting the continuing high incidence of claims. Experience in the Liability classes was also substantially adverse.

In the United States, net written premiums were $193.3m (1982 $181.3m) and the operating ratio was 109.70% compared with 111.04% for the same period last year. This marginal improvement which largely stems from a comparatively better weather experience, was reflected in all major lines. On the United Kingdom accounting basis, the underwriting loss was £13.5m (1982 £12.7m loss).

Elsewhere there were aggregate underwriting losses of £7.2m (1982 £15.8m loss). The substantial part of this improvement arose in Canada where there was a modest profit after a loss of £5.4m a year ago. Despite an improved result from France, E.E.C. territories deteriorated £1.1m to a loss of £5.2m due principally to a very adverse experience in Ireland. Australia maintained last year's underwriting loss at £2.6m after claims from bush fires amounting to £2.8m.

Knight pierces Kent's armour

By Peter Ball

CANTERBURY: Surrey, with all wickets in hand, need 151 runs to beat Kent.

After some easy pickings in the early weeks against university bowling, Kent are suddenly finding runs hard to come by. From the moment Roger Knight won the toss in this Benson and Hedges Cup match yesterday and asked tham to bat on a damp pitch they were up against it. Their final total of 150, reached n quarter of an bour before bad light and rain brought pay to a close, was considerably higher than initially looked likely.

Althnugh the weather forecasters were proved right before tea time, the game started under a cloudless sky. The previous day's storm had left its mark on the pitch, however, and the opening overs confirmed suspicions that Tavaré's first mistake might prove fatal.

After eight overs, Kent had paiofully acquired five runs, but it was then that the advent of the medium-pace pair of Knight and Monkhouse undermined their faltering progress.

The Surrey captain has something nf a reputation for being more dangerous than he appears, but on this occasinn the pitch was more helpful to his medium pace than to the speed of Clarke and Thomas, well as the latter bowled in his npening spell. If h was not unplayable, h was unpredictable. One ball stopped, another flew and a third kept low.

Taylor miscued a drive to give Thomas a comfortable catch. Woolmer followed almost immedintely, slashing at a shorter ball to give Richards the first of three catches, and when Tavaré was leg-before playing half forwards to a ball which kept low, Kent were 32 for three after 20 overs.

Worse was to come as Monkhouse took his turn. Benson had not looked at ease even before n ball lifted sharply to hit him on the helmet, but be was clearly displeased with the leg-before decision which saw his exit. Knott, so often the man fnr such a situation, this time went quickly, driving at a ball of full length to be well caught by Howarth at first slip.

At 46 for five, the Kent innings was apparently in ruins, but Cowdrey and Johnson set about repairing it with some conviction. Cowdrey in particular batted to a way which suggested that neither the pitch nor the bowling was totally responsible for Kent's plight; Johnson lent solid support and they were still together when Knight and Monkhouse finished their allotted overs.

With the pitch apparently easing after lunch, Kent's hopes of at least having something to bowl at began to improve, but when the pair had put on 60 they were parted by Pocock and another collapse followed. Clarke accounted for Ellison and Dilley, and Pocock denied Cowdrey a well-deserved 50, persuading him into a sweep. That left Underwood and Jarvis with a lot to do.

Marks of the impish long-hop

By Alan Gibson

TAUNTON: Hampshire have scored 78 for three against Somerset.

There was no play at Taunton until 3.30. I was surprised that there was any at all, so soggy was the ground, but the staff had worked hard, and though thunderous clouds were nverhead all the rest of the day, they shed no more than heavy drizzle until six o'clock, when the match had to be abandoned for the day. I would not think that the hnpes for today are too good. We did manage to get in 33 overs by the close, and Somerset had the better of them.

Somerset won the toss and put Hampshire in. The pitch was soft and slow, and Garner and Botham could get little from it. Greenidge and Smith went cantiously, through Greenidge did hit Botham for a solid six backwards of square leg. After 10 overs, the score was 15; nt tea, after 16 overs, it was 40, and Hampshire had to get a move on.

Smith was out, caught at mid-off when Wilson came on. The catcher was Marks, who then proceeded to get out Jesty and Turner, and bowl his full 11 overs, for 22 runs. Both were caught attempting big hits. At present Marks seems to be able to get good batsmen into trouble merely by alternating long-hops and half-volleys; they suspect depth of running in both. He has shaved his beard, and has now less the look of the wizard than the imp. But he does keep getting them out, and might very well have got Nicholas out too, for all the batsman knew about the ball.

All-round credit and a bonus point for the groundsman

By John Woodcock, Cricket Correspondent

SLOUGH: Essex (2pts) beat Minor Counties by 9 wickets

There was some credit for everyone in yesterday's Benson and Hedges Cup match between Essex and Minor Counties. It was due to the Slough club for managing to produce their agreeable little ground to such good order; to Minor Counties for giving Essex a game; and to Essex for winning it comfortably enough in the end. Needing 141, they got them in the forty-second of the 55 overs.

Essex's victory has virtually assured them of a place in the quarter-finals of the competition, and, so long as they win their group, of a home tie. Since losing to Hertfordshire in 1976, Essex has taken nothing for granted when playing matches they should win. Yesterday the weather made them that much more eager.

For making as many as they did Minor Counties were indebted to their later batsmen. At 82 for seven after 44 overs, in poor light and light rain, it was barely n contest. Given another chance, Collyer might have chosen to field first, despite one very damp run-up. The best of the weather for batting came later to the day. With Essex, to a man, bowling very accurately, Minor Counties were soon wondering where the runs were going to come from.

Of their side half a dozen had played varying amounts of championship cricket. These included the current coaches at Charterhouse (Lewis), Stowe (Pont) and Taunton (Kennedy). Kennedy and Lewis were out when the ball was still moving about; Pont, with a brother playing for Essex, carved the ball around as Minor Counties ran out of overs and then bowled heartily when Essex went in.

For an hour Plumb, of Norfolk, defended soundly. No sooner had be started to play a shot or two, though, than he was run out, Bailey sending him back when Plumb wanted a third run to the third man boundary. Bailey himself made 27 in 26 overs, in a manner befitting the father of the side. He was fifth out, well caught at the wicket off the inside edge.

At lunch Minor Counties were 67 for six. The first hour afterwards was lost to rain. It was touch and go whether the whole of the rest nf the day would be, but we missed, somehow, the worst of the storms, and Essex were to bat for most of their innings in unaccustomed sunshine.

For Essex, Gooch was prepared to toy with the bowling, Fletcher to respect it, and Hardie to make it look almost mplayable. Gooch had just driven Surridge straight for one six and hooked Pont for another when he was bowled, attempting something unworthy of him.

The wild duck chase

Two weeks before England's squad are picked for the Prudential World Cup, selector, Alec Bedser, is concerned about the lack of play so far because of the weather. Mr Bedser has seen only one and three-quarters days' action and if the weather does not improve substantially there will be little or no chance of a promising contender forcing his way into a squad that must be submitted to the International Cricket Conference by June 4.

"When you don't see any cricket you have to back your own judgment and stick to the tried and trusted performer," Mr Bedser said. "But it will be difficult for those fellows as well because they haven't played much, either.

"Our bowling is a problem. Those who may have had a chance just have not had enough match nvers and it is worrying. Some of our opposition in the World Cup – Australia, West Indies, India and Sri Lanka – will come here with international cricket under their belts, having just finished playing Tests."

Barnett plagued by run out rash

By Gerald Richmond

Trent Bridge: Nottinghamshire (2pts) beat Derbyshire by 51 runs.

Kim Barnett, at 22 the youngest captain to Derbyshire's history, was given un indication of the problems ahead when Nottinghamshire won yesterday's Benson and Hedges Cup match in a canter. Nottinghamshire, batting and bowling infinitely better, went to the top of group B after their second victory this week and Hadlee won the gold award.

Nottinghamshire won the toss and soon lost Robinson and Hassan, caught by Taylor off outside and inside edge respectively. The recovery was hastened when Tunnicliffe was brought on for the thirtenth over and found the relevant length elusive.

When he dropped short, Rice hooked and pulled him; when he pitched the ball np, he was hammered through the covers, that over cost 22: four fours and a six. To his cridit, Tunnicliffe recovered from this shock, but it eased the pressure on Nottinghamshire, who were able to negotiate tight spells by Wood and Miller without anxiety. These two gave np only 48 runs between them, fewer than any single one of the other bowlers.

Randall, acrobatically caught at short fine leg, was out in Miller's first over, but Rice moved past lunch and a 65 minute interruption for rain to a fine half-century before Tunnicliffe gained a measure of revenge by having him caught behind off n huge top edge.

On a pitch offering some help to bowlers, Nottinghamshire's acurate attack soon made their 226 for eight appear more formidable, especially when Derbyshire's extreme caution gave way to extreme rashness. Wood ran out Wright and then, suffering a rush of blood when his runs finally matched the overs bowled, ran himself out trying a second to Birch. Barnett, the new captain, was also run out by the length of the pitch

Lamb returns to form with chanceless 106

LEICESTER: Northamptonshire (2 pts) beat Leicestershire by eight wickets.

Allan Lamb, the only leading England batsman without a big score this season, surged back to form with a match-winning century for Northamptonshire in the Benson and Hedges Cup at Grace Road yesterday. Lamb, who won the gold award, hit one six and 13 fours in n chanceless 106 not out, his best score to this competition.

The South African was magnificently supported by Willey (54 nnt out) in an unbroken stand of 164 which clinched a convincing victory. Lamb's previous best this season had been 42 and his return to form was doubly important with selection for England's World Cup squad a fortnight away.

Earlier, Leicestershire struggled in the damp conditions to reach a modest 171 for seven wickets off their 55 overs. Balderstone was top scorer with 30 in as many overs, but some big hitting from tailender, Parsons, (29 not out) and an unbeaten 28 by Steele in a 52-run eight wicket partnership gave the Leicestershire innings a little respectability.

Parsons hit three sixes in the last two overs but no other home batsman mastered either the conditions or the Northamptonshire seam bowlers Tim Lamb (three wickets for 28) and Capel (three for 24).

Northamptonshire roke through in the 10th over when Briers edged Tim Lamb's first ball to Sharp. Gower did not find the going any easier, taking six overs to get off the mark. Leicestershire did not record a boundary until the 14th over.

Balderstone and Gower scratched only 22 runs before rain stopped play for 20 minutes. On the resumption, Gower was caught behind off Tim Lmb, and Davison failed to score, bowled by an inswinger from Griffiths. In the last over before lunch, Balderstone was leg before in Capel. Soon after lunch Capel also had Garnham caught by Sharp.

Gloucester Scots scare

Scotland's efforts to play this match, which included a rapid change of venue from the Titwood ground in Glasgow to Hamilton Crescent in the same city, came to naught as they were beaten by Gloucestershire.

A fter they had been bowled out for 90, with the Gloucester captain Graveney taking three for 13 in 11 teasing overs of left-arm spin. Gloucester were in something of a spin themselves later on as they collapsed to 52 for six. But after de Neef had taken three for 14 and Morton three for 17 the young Gloucester wicketkeeper Russell made 36 not out to take his side to victory with 10.1 overs to spares.

The saturated outfield prevented any play in the morning, but after an early lunch the game eventually got under way three hours late.

Struggle in rain against seamers

By Richard Streeton

HEADINGLEY: Yorkshire, with five wickets in hand, need 136 to beat Lancashire.

Yorkshire, needing to win this Benson and Hedges Cup tie to have any chance of reaching the last eight, were struggling against the Lancashire seam bowlers when rain prevented the match being completed last night. Yorkshire were then 87 for five and they had 19.2 overs left.

Lancashire's innings was a little while gathering momentum. Ten overs remained when Hayes was fourth out at 150 and soon afterwards Clive Lloyd flicked a catch in short mid-wicket. In the end, spirited driving and pulling from Abrahams, together with help from Maynard, enabled Lancashire to reach 222. Yorkshire conceded 47 runs in the final five overs with the raw Dennis and Ramage the sufferers.

Earlier Yorkshire's seam bowling successfully pinned down their opponents on a pitch which was a shade livelier than on Monday. Illingworth, for the second day running, also made an important contribution. Illingworth, who is 51 next month, understandably finds it hard work m the field at times, but his changes of pace and variations of flight remain a joy to watch when he is bowling.

Fowler was just starting to hint that he might have found the range, so to speak, when be was out to a tumbling catch at deep mid-on. Hayes had managed only seven runs in 13 overs when he suddenly drove Illingworth for a straight six. Hughes, thnugh, was primarily responsible for the run rate increasing befnre be mistimed Illingworth's quicker ball and Love judged the catch well as he ran in from long on. Hayes was bowled moving out to drive Illingworth.

Yorkshire's start was even more cautious than Lancashire's had been and was always going to leave n heavy burden on the later batsmen. The lack of cricket in recent days has helped no nne but the failure early on to push singles, and keep the score moving, was again noticeable, just as it had been against Nottinghamshire the day before. Yorkshire were 76 for four from 33 overs when bad light and rain brought the second nf two 20 minute stoppages.

By then Sharp and Athey had failed and O'Shaughnessy had completed a hostile and accurate stint which brought him 11–3–14–2. Boycott, third out in the seventeenth over, was beaten by a breakback; Love played nn. When the players returned Bairstow hooked a high catch to long leg before rain brought a third halt, this time for good, with the abandonment coming just befnre seven o'clock.

Rugby won a keenly contested match with only two overs to spare by 21 runs. Repton won the toss and put Rugby in on an uncertain wicket, which in fact played well all day, and, almost unbelievably this season, not a ball was lost through rain.

Umbers, having lost his opening partner in the first over, was joined by Leaver, the Rugby captain. They ran sensibly between the wickets, but both found it difficult to get the ball away. After an hour Umbers was nnt and the score was 33. When Emmerson came into the attack be bowled an accurate line, kept the ball up and had the batsmen in more trouble. At lunch the score was 65 for three, with Cleverly, top scorer with 39, looking solid as be held the middle of the innings together.

Slowly the score advanced, but Emmerson had his tail up, and was not to be denied. Once Cleverly went, only Cock achieved double figures, and the innings closed at 119. Emmerson bowled 17 overs and collected six for 34.

As in the Rugby innings, Repton lost an opener, in this case Whitehouse, in the first over. Fenton bowled at a lively pace, making the most of his height, and collected the first two wickets. Lovell was brilliantly run out and then Benn, having just hit a four, struck the ball high and wide of Squire, who made a spectacular driving catch at mid-on.

Robinson and Gibbon looked purposefully for runs and it needed Fnton to come back to break the partnership. Leaver, with only one stump at which to aim from extra cover, increased the tension by achieving a second outstanding ro out.

Incompatibility mars America's Cup bid

DAVID MILLER

Newport, Rhode Island

Harry Cudmore is the Jack Charlton of British sailing – fearlessly outspoken, single-minded, often right but sometimes wrong, widely admired by his fellow professional yachtsmen, a natural leader and one of our most accomplished helmsmen. A fortnight ago he was fired from Peter de Savary's America's Cup syndicate in training here.

There are various versions of the split. De Savary's is that it was n mutually agreed parting, arising out of incompatibility of ideas on how to run the £6m campaign to take the trophy off the Americans for the first time. Another is that Cudmore actually gave de Savary an ultimatum: make him skipper or he would resign. If the second is true, then Cudmore should have known there could be only one outcome.

It had become increasingly obvious to some observers here, inside and outside the 90-strong squad, that there was not room to Newport for both men. Cudmore, bronzed, 6ft 3in, was much admired by the 25 other crewmen in training and the shore-based back-up party. Though he did not provoke disunity, far from it, he is also the sort of man who is not without self-interest.

De Savary, who is simultaneously motivated by a profound belief io Britain's ability to win and a not ioconsiderable egotism, is the most ambitious non-playing captain since George III, updated to lead his troops from the same side of the Atlantic with the backing of sophisticated technology, a seemingly bottomless bank account buttressed by Arab interests, and a similar quantity of optimism. But there are those who wonder if be has got the formula right.

The problem is that nobody other than he has any authority to make major decisions; hence when he is away on business decisions get postponed, hence the confrontatioo with Cudmore. For the first time an America's Cup challenge is being launched on a squad system, with two boats and two crews working in simultaneous, level-ranking rivalry. That in itself makes as much sound sense as Sir Alf Ramsey taking 40 players on tour to South America before the 1970 World Cup in Mexico. Competitioo for places concentrates the mind and eliminates complacency.

De Savary contemptuously dismisses recent stories of dissent among the squad, and of Cudmore's dismissal insists: "If we are working oo a two-boat squad system, there must be no superstar, and to my judgment the one least likely to fit that strategy was Harry Cudmore. It could well be that as an individual, be was the best of the lot. But he agreed disagree, though he is still available if we need him."

De Savary talks of the possibility tbnt sooner or later someone might have wanted to wrap a winch handle round Cudmore's neck, and certainly one of the more experienced crew members told me laconically that "we'd had some interesting eonversations across the length of the boat". Not everyone loved him. But can the eventual challenging boat and crew survive the ioteuse physical and psychological pressure of 60 qualifying races and, optimistically, the best-of-seven challenge round without a leader on board to form n roiddle management between the Indians and the big chiefs?

It can be argued that Lionheart failed to 1980 because among other reasons, Robin Oakely, the skipper-manager, resisted having any other established helmsman on board. De Savary sooner or later has to choose between three, all highly experienced – Phil Crebbin, Rodney Pattisson and Lawrie Smith – and says: "Two and possibly all three will be on board, but we are not seeking to appoint any one man io charge. There are 11 functions on the boat, and the notion of skipper does not exist. A leader? It isn't that simple. There's a helmsman, a tactician, a man on the 'throttle' (the main-sheet), and those on the winches and foredeck. Everyooe is too busy concentrating on their role, though the tactician will call the shots in any one race.

"But we may decide to change the tactics in principle between one race and the next. At present all three helmsmen are working well together, and we are a long way off a conclusioo. I'll decide towards the end of the elimination races, maybe even at the end, oo the best mao. For the moment I am lettiog them get on with it and compete."

This, too, can be justified in the analogy with football, recalling that in 1966 Ramsey, that considerable judge of sporting temperment, dropped bis captain, Bobby More, shortly before the World Cup finals, specifically to jolt his complacency. De Savary argued that to make, at this stage, one boat a "first XI" and the other reserve would destroy team work and iocentive, "and demotivate the campaign".

Pattison: no complacency

This is borne out by the crew, one whom says: "We've worked at America's Cup pressure in training, to the limits, with some collisions and protests between the boats. There's been some blood spilt out there, but anyone can break a leg or an arm and be replaced without disruption."

Yet those with more sporting experience than De Savary would say that sooner rather than later he must stop dangling the carrot and go for the harmony of the settled crew, with a more clearly defioed chain of authority. It is not good that, with a month before the first qualifying race, some members of the squad in prominent positions, after a year of preparation, still gaze out to sea in the opposite directions if you ask them a leading question.

De Savary argues that people io the boat can take out their aggression on him and bite his head off if things are going wrong, whereas American helmsmen in times of stress "have nowhere to turn but the bar". But all the iodications are that the only man prepared to stand up lo De Savary was Cudmore – and look what happened to him.

The other danger of not having an established "middle management" is that if at the start of the qualifying campaign thiogs go wrong, De Savary may be tempted, like all successful men, to think be can correct matiers with rdical "decision-making".

His policy of indefinite flexibility has some merit, but sporting precedents in other fields suggest that the main decisions should be made now.

The right course for Miss Wright

By Lewine Mair

In the first nf the two qualifying rounds for the Scottish Ladies' Championships at North Berwick there was plenty of material for both sides in the argument as to whether or not the course, at 5,800 yards, was too short.

Pam Wright, of Aboyne, came in with n 70 against the par of 74, closely followed by Belle Robertson on 72 and Gillian Stewart and Wilma Aitken on 73. At the other end of the scale there were scores running in to three figures.

Miss Wright, who will be 19 next month, hasdno fewer than six birdies in a score which brought her handicap to plus three. (Interestingly, in winning four Scottish titles and playing in a quarted of Curtis Cup matches, her mother, Janette, never moved into the realm of plus handicap).

Runner-up in these champinnships to Jane Connachan a year ago, Miss Wright has still to win her Curtis Cup place. She has won international honours at every other level.

Mrs Robertson, wearing sheepskin mittens between shots in the bleak and misty conditions, had five birdies in her 73. All that troubled the sextuple Scottish champion was a missed putt from four feet on the first green and the three putts she spilt at the eighth.

Up until the moment she looked at the leaderboard inside the clubhouse door, Miss Connachan had felt that her 77 would be handily placed. Out in 38, she had been far from dissatisfied with a homeward half through the wind of 39. Like Mrs Robertson, though, she had a couple of bad experiences nn the green, her father summing them up expressively with a cheerful observatinn to the effect that "She couldna' putt into a basin".

Kathryn Imrie, aged 15, had a cnmmendable 75. Two under par after 16 holes, she went over the wall at the seventeenth, a hole she had not played in practice, and wound up with a seven. Sharon Gallagher, of Peebles, turned in n 76, having had nn practice round at all.

QUALIFYING ROUND: 70: P Wright (Aboyne). 72: B Robertson (Dunaverty). 73: G Stewart (Inverness), W Aitken (Old Ranfurly). 75: K Imrie (Monifieth). 76: S Gallagher (Peebles). J Marshall (Baberton). 77: L Bennett (Haggs Castle), J Connachan (Royal Musselburgh), C Middleton (Cruden Bay).

Fine putting display by Mrs Bailey

Mrs Bailey, who has never gone more than two rounds in the championship, mastered the fierce, cold wind that battered the south coast with a 76, two over par, in which she holed nine single putts, one of them from 25 yards. This gave her a share of the lead in the first qualifying round with Christine Nelson, nf Middlesex, runner-up fnr the title last year.

Mrs Bailey made the most nf her splendid start. She picked up two birdies on the way and annther at the ninth to reach the turn in 35. She had to struggle for her figures coming home against the wind, but continued to hole the putts, one of more than cricket pitch length in save her par at the 15th. "They just all seemed to drop", she said.

Miss Nelson, a freelance secretary and weekend golfer, who has nnt been able to afford the time to play in the Middlesex champinnship for the past two years, missed a great npportunty to take the nutright lead. After getting close to the par five 17th in two, she needed three more tn hole, and then took three putts nn the last green.

Sarah Haslam, a Worcestershire county golfer from Kidderminster, had the first hole in one nf her career, with a six-iron atthe 147-yard 16th. But two hnles later she shanked into a bush, tonk three to get nut, and then took three putts fnr a nine in a round of 84.

LEADING SCORERS: 76: C Bailey (Tandridge), C Nelson (Hendon). 77: C Waite (Swindon). 78: B New (Lanadown), K Doughes (Long Ashton). 79: J Walter (St Ives), J Thornhill (Walton Heath). 80: P Hunt (Tyneside), M Gallagher (Cowdray Park), L Davies (West Byfleet), A Uzielli (Berkis), N McCormack (Porters Park). 81: P Grice (Tankersley Park), S Hedges (Wrotham Heath), S Duhig (Gillingham), T Hammond (Leamington and County). 82: A Nicholas (Hallamshire), L Percival (Sandiway).

Miss Barker's star turn

Susan Barker, the former British tennis Nn 1, began yesterday with a practice session against Chris Lloyd at Wimbledon and then defeated the Jamaica-born Brixton player, Metelva Davidson, in the Paddington hard court tournament. Miss Barker won 6-0, 6-1 and said: "I decided to withdraw from the Berlin event to play here in the hope of getting plenty of match practice and that is what I need after a disappointing few weeks."

Long and lonely win

Vasto, Italy (Reuter) – Eduardo Chozas, nf Spain, gained the first major triumph of his professional cycling career today when he wan the longest stage of the Tour of Italy at the end of a 50-mile lone hreakaway.

The 23-year-old rider went clear on the climb at Chieti and clung on to his lead on the flat remainder of the 269-kilometre course from Terni, the fifth stage of the cycling classic. At nne point Chozas extended his margin over the pack to 30 seconds but became visibly tired climbing intn Vasto. He finished 21 seconds ahead of Vittorin Algeri of Italy.

FOOTBALL: ENGLAND'S HOME INTERNATIONAL SQUAD

By Stuart Jones, Football Correspondent

The vision of Bobby Robson, England's manager, is blurred, and not surprisingly. Forced to fix one eye on the British title and to train the other on the Australian tour, he is focusing somewhere between the present and the future. Yesterday he looked once more at preparations thrown out of perspective by the usual tiresome spate of injuries and club commitments.

Robson has yet to catch sight of anything like his strongest side. In his seven matches so far, injuries have ruled out a remarkable total of 47 players otherwise likely to be selected. Yesterday he announced his choices for the home internationals against Northern Ireland, in Belfast on May 28, and Scotland, at Wembley on June 1, and felt compelled to omit a further 19 of his previous selections. Injury victims this time include: Martin (West Ham), Bennett (West Bromwich Albion), Caton (Manchester City), Coppell (Manchester United), Chamberlain (Stoke), Mariner (Ipswich), Regis (West Bromwich Albion), and Woodcock and Rix (both Arsenal).

Worse is to come. Almost half of the squad of 21 including all his most experienced members except Francis, are to fly off after the match against Scotland to various unlikely summer resorts with their club colleagues. When he chooses his Australian party within the next 48 hours, Robson has little option but to pick a new defence and a new midfield.

"It has become unavoidable that the sides for the home internationals and Australia are two separate issues," Robson said yesterday. "The clubs have dictated that. I have tried to keep what is right for the home internationals, in terms of the senior players, but look to those who will be available in the summer for a few of the other places."

Some promising youngsters, therefore, may gain financial rewards with their clubs but lose a chance to play for their country. Robson gave Duxbury, Manchester United's talented and uncapped right back, as an example, one of the substitutes against Hungary, he is dropped in favour of Thomas, of Coventry City, who has been standing on the international touchline.

Yet there are exceptions and Duxbury may be puzzled by the inclusion of Roberts, an uncompromising defender who will be in Swaziland with Tottenham Hotspur early in June. "He is a hard tackler and I feel I must see him at international level."

Roberts was one of three players ordered to stand by a month ago when England's squad to meet Hungary was yet again severely depleted. Two other names mentioned at the time were Barnes and Walsh, the ebony-and-ivory keys in the Under-21 attacking formation, and outstanding for Watford and Luton Town respectively this season. They are both exciting prospects, and their promotion is to be welcomed.

The ease with which Butcher and Martin were outmanoeuvred by both the Hungarians and the Welsh was evident. "Wright is a youngster with great calmness on the ball," Robson. "He looks comfortable in tight situations and he is quick. He looks to have that extra half a yard of pace which can be so important.

The inclusion of Hoddle, whose future at Tottenham is still uncertain, is perhaps the most welcome of all. He has played for only a few minutes under Robson, as a substitute against Luxembourg but even then he immediately introduced touches of rare artistry and stroked home a majestic half-volley.

The fortunes of Hill, who withdrew yesterday with a pulled hamstring, contrast sharply with those of Withe. A month ago Withe faced operations on his thumb, cheek and knee. On Monday night he played in a reserve game and proved not only his fitness but also his determination.

Robson revealed that "he has volunteered not to go to Spain with Aston Villa this week so that he can concentrate on getting fit for England. That is the sort of spirit I'm looking for". It seems sadly significant that few others either want to or allowed to put their country before their club.

PARTY: P Shilton (Southampton), R Clemence (Tottenham Hotspur), P Neal (Liverpool), K Sansom (Arsenal), D Thomas (Coventry), D Statham (West Bromwich Albion), T Butcher (Ipswich), R Osman (Ipswich), M Wright (Southampton), G Roberts (Tottenham Hotspur), S Lee (Liverpool), G Mabbutt (Tottenham Hotspur), B Robson (Manchester United), G Cowans (Aston Villa), G Hoddle (Tottenham Hotspur), R Wilkins (Manchester United), A Devonshire (West Ham), L Blissett (Watford), T Francis (Sampdoria), P Withe (Aston Villa), J Barnes (Watford), P Walsh (Luton).

Experience and aggression: Forest's Hart transplant

Leeds lose Hart

Nottingham Forest have signed Paul Hart from Leeds United for £60,000. The 30-year-old centre back, who joined Leeds from Blackpool for £330,000 five years ago, made 223 appearances for the Elland Road club.

Brian Clough, the Forest manager, said: "Hart has all the ingredients required – experience and aggression."

Leeds have also placed Arthur Graham, on the transfer list. The Scottish international left wing, signed from Aberdeen six years ago, had been a regular member of the Leeds first team before losing his place towards the end of the season.

Leeds are parting with Graham at a time when they are due to take back Peter Barnes, who has had a one-season spell with Real Betis in Seville. The former England winger has indicated he plans to return home and is expected to play for Leeds in the second division next season.

Hateley, an England under-21 striker, has had contract talks with Coventry's chairman, Iain Jamieson, and the newly appointed manager, Bobby Gould, and it is understood they ended in deadlock.

Thomas, who is also an under-21 international, has formally notified Coventry that he will not re-sign.

Gerry Francis, the club captain, whose contract has 12 months to run also had talks about his future at the club yesterday.

Hankin, the former Burnley and Leeds United forward, joined Middlesbrough from Vancouver Whitecaps for £85,000 last year.

Blackpool's black day

Thirty years after winning the FA Cup in the famous Matthews final, Blackpool face the indignity of having to apply for reelection to the Football League. Monday evenings drawn game between Tranmere Rovers and Rochdale put Blackpool in the bottom four but it is not the first time they have had to reapply. They faced a similar situation back in 1889 when there were only two divisions in the league.

The club chairman, Ken Chadwick, said: "It is the lowest point of my life having to apply for reelection for a great club like Blackpool".

Brighton end Foster appeal

Brighton conceded defeat yesterday in their attempt to have their captain, Steve Foster, available for Saturday's FA Cup Final against Manchester Utd when they decided not to appeal against Monday's High Court decision that Foster's two-match suspension should stand.

Foster was automatically banned for two games after collecting 31 disciplinary points. He missed Brighton's game at Norwich on Saturday, but hoped that the unprecedented High Court hearing would free him for Wembley. The case went against him, however, and yesterday, after his legal advisors had considered the judge's summing up, plans for an appeal were dropped and a statement issued.

The decision is a bitter disappointment for Foster and for Brighton's manager Jimmy Melia, who has championed the England international defender's cause throughout the affair. Tony Grealish will replace Foster as captain.

Chris Ramsey also missed the Norwich game, when he was finishing a two-game ban, and Melia had been worried that the young full-back would not be fit enough for the final. But those doubts evaporated when Ramsey played for Brighton in Monday's 3-1 Football Combination defeat by Oxford at the Goldstone Ground. "Mentally I was a bit tired. I got better as the game went on," Ramsey said.

Melia does not intend to confirm his line-up before Thursday, but is likely to switch Steve Gatting from left back to fill Foster's central defensive role, and use the former Barnet player Graham Pearce at full back.

One selection problem not yet resolved concerns Brighton's longest-serving player, the 27-year-old Eire international Gerry Ryan, who is expected to be omitted in favour of Gary Howlett. The former England youth player, aged 20, scored on his league debut against Liverpool, and is likely to start the match in midfield, with Ryan substitute.

"It's the best week we have had for ages in terms of players being fit", the United manager Ron Atkinson said after Laurie Cunningham and Lou Macari had each proved their readiness

Fulham appeal goes ahead

Fulham have decided to go ahead with an appeal to the Football Association after the decision of a Football League commission on Monday to refuse a replay of the match with Derby County, which Fulham lost 1-0 at the Baseball Ground on Saturday.

Bailey: ready

Chester in new plea to League

Sir Norman Chester is pressing the Football League to set up a committee to keep alive those parts of his long-term plan for football that next month's annual meeting look set to reject. He is eager to stop his 1983 report from going the way of his first in 1968, with special emphasis on the recommendations aimed at helping clubs in the lower divisions.

Sir Norman said yesterday: "It would be wrong to give the impression that the whole thing is over, that decisions have been made and that is an end to it. I wanted to try to get a structure and pattern of football that would stand up for the future. We've started something and it would be sad if the League was allowed to let it drop."

He opposed his committee's recommendation to amalgamate the third and fourth division's and criticized the chairmen's recent decision to let "natural wastage" solve the league's inefficient bulk.

"My proposal aims to keep clubs in existence, but at a level below the Football League," he said. "A football club bearing the name of a town is part of the British social structure, but that does not mean that all town clubs must be included in the Football League".

Cyril Townsend, who represented the banks on Sir Norman's committee, delivered a warning to the clubs as they considered how much of the report to implement. "There will be a lot of fall-outs in the next two or three years. In the east banks have been a little over-indulgent and sympathetic, but now they are saying 'enough is enough'. A note of firmness has crept in."

With the game's aggregate debt at around £40m, Mr Townsend said: "I'm sure that banks were looking for the League to put its financial affairs in some sort of order.

Bingham has hopes for his World Cup trio

Northern Ireland could lose two players from their party for the home international matches if the weekend's two cup finals go to replays. Norman Whiteside, of Manchester United, is involved in the FA Cup Final, and John McClelland, of Rangers, is in the Scottish Cup Final. If replays are required, the clubs will withdraw the players.

The Northern Ireland manager, Billy Bingham, hopes to play his three first choice forwards, Whiteside included, for the first time since the World Cup Finals in Spain. The other two are Gerry Armstrong, of Watford, and Billy Hamilton, of Burnley.

"I'm looking forward to operating with this trio again, particularly as it will enable Armstrong to play in his best position, as a deep-lying centre forward." Bingham said.

Two Irish League players, Jim Cleary and Gerry Mullan, both with Glentoran, have also been included. Cleary played against Scotland and Wales last season; Mullan, formerly with Everton, came on as a forward in the European Championship tie against Albania last month.

Bingham has drafted two young defenders into his squad for the matches against Scotland, England and Wales later this month. Jim Hagan, of Birmingham City, and Nigel Worthington, of Notts County, both of whom have been on the verge of international recognition for some time, get their chances because Jim Nicholl, of Toronto Blizzards, one of the regulars, is not returning for the series.

Worthington has been a member of the squad on two previous occasions without being capped, and Hagan, formerly with Coventry, has never been included. The regular squad player, David McCreery is unavailable, as he is needed by his club, Newcastle United, for a mur.

The match against England on Saturday week has a 7.30 kick-off, an arrangement made to facilitate television coverage, from which the Irish FA collect £100,000 annually. "This is our lifeblood, the cash which helps us administer the game. Any other revenue is jam," the Irish FA president, Harry Cavan, said.

PARTY: P Jennings (Arsenal), J Platt (Middlesbrough), J Hagan (Birmingham), J McClelland (Rangers), C Nichol (Southampton), J O'Neill (Leicester), M Donaghy (Luton), N Worthington (Notts County), S McIlroy (Stoke), M O'Neill (Norwich), J Cleary (Glentoran), I Stewart (Queens Park Rangers), B Hamilton (Burnley), D Armstrong (Watford), N Brotherston (Blackburn), N Whiteside (Manchester United), G Mullan (Glentoran).

● Freddie Pye, Wigan's chairman, blocked a move to put the third division club into voluntary liquidation and then resigned yesterday. Fellow directors, Albert Eckersley, Fred Summers and Bobby Charlton, who had also been acting manager since Larry Lloyd's dismissal, also resigned from the board. Bristol Rovers have offered their vacant manager's post to Lloyd.

UEFA delete Robertson's goals

John Robertson, the Hearts forward who scored both Scotland goals in their 4-2 defeat by England in the European Youth Championship on Sunday, should not have played. UEFA confirmed yesterday that Robertson was ineligible because he had played for Hearts the previous day. The rules state that a player cannot appear for his club once the youth tournament has started.

The result of Sunday's game has been amended to a 3-0 win for England – the fixed penalty for fielding an ineligible player.

Eriksson looks for a double

Lisbon (Reuter) – Sven Eriksson, Swedish manager of last season's UEFA Cup winners, Gothenburg, looks likely to achieve a notable double when Benfica, his new club, meet Anderlecht of Belgium in the second leg of this season's final here today (9.0)

Eriksson, who schemed Gothenburg's 3-0 away win over Hamburg to secure Sweden's first European trophy, has a less daunting task in attempting to overturn Anderlecht's 1-0 first-leg lead.

Eriksson, however, may regard Real Madrid's 2-1 defeat by Aberdeen in last week's European Cup Winers' Cup final as a cautionary tale. Like Real, Benfica have a great tradition, having reached five European Cup finals in the sixties, but the Spaniards found their reputation alone was not enough.

Eriksson is likely to demand and get far more from his players than Alfredo di Stefano did from Real Madrid. He put the team through a high-speed final training session yesterday, concentrating on giving a good service to Filipovic, the Yugoslav striker, who has recovered from a leg injury.

ANDERLECHT (from): Munaron, Hofkens, Olsen, Peruzovic, Degroote, Lozano, Frimann, Coeck, Vercauteren, Vandenbergh, Brylle, Czerniatynski, Degreef.

Csernai dismissed

Pal Csernai, Bayern Munich's Hungarian-born manager, has been dismissed, ending a four and a half year tenure which brought two West German League titles, one cup win, but failure on the European front. He will be replaced, at least until the end of the season, by his deputy, Reinhard Saftig, aged 31.

Game that bowls them over in suburbia cannot be casually mastered

OUTPOSTS

It's not all beer and skittles at the Tolworth bowling alley. Ian Nicolle, being a British international tenpin bowler, had a duty to the rest of the Rams team, and urgently needed to return scores of 210. Harnessing the skills he used against Norway's finest sons, he ambled to the foul line and chucked the 16lb ball away with a casual, nonsense-free air.

As usual, the ball whizzed directly towards the outside pins, an apparent misdirection that would demolish a mere half dozen of them, but then performed an apparent act of total disobedience to Newton's laws of physics by making an abrupt left turn, scything in behind the lead pin, chopping it down in its prime, and clouting the fifth pin dead centre. With a satisfying death rattle, the domino effect was achieved, total demolition was established, and the other four Rams all said "ray!", and proffered hands, palms, up to the triomphant one. He patted each of them, as was his due, and slouched back to watch his colleagues continue this epic of destruction.

For this was the Surrey area championships at the Charrington Bowl, Tolworth, and the air was thick with the sound of rattling, crashing, cartwheeling pins, the rumble of the huge cannon balls along the much pampered wooden lanes, and the shouts of triumph and congratulation.

Nicolle said: "Most people think of tenpin bowling as a recreation. But to us it's a sport." Actually, most of us think of tenpin bowling not so much as a recreation as mucking about: as about important in sporting terms as coke and burgers are gastronomically.

The location of this particular bowling centre seems to sum it all up: if football is a street game of the inner city, then tenpin is an emblem of suburbia. "All the family can play," the centre's manageress, Jean Furguson, said, and for people who have spent a life of disappointment at the fact that their mothers, this has to be good news. "There's not much else to do around here," Miss Furguson added candidly.

Wild dream

But tenpin is nonetheless a sport concerned with the pursuit of excellence, and a game where perfection is both spectacularly graspable and disturbingly remote. To whack all the pins down in one go and score a "strike", thereby doubling the rewards of your next two balls, is not difficult. To score further strikes with these next two is a lot harder. The ultimate perfection, a 10-frame game with a total of 300 points for 12 consecutive strikes, is for most players only a wild dream.

But not for Glen Gibbons. He is a lanky 16-year-old who has achieved this genuinely remarkable feat in a league gme at Tolworth, and Tolworth is still rejoicing. He was there at the Surrey area championships, with a technique that makes him look like an over-enthusiastic drama student requested to portray the concept of gawkiness. He moved towards the line with arms and legs in odd places: only at the moment of release does he find grace and cohesion, and the result is a machine-tooled accuracy. He is an international in the making, a genuine sporting talent.

Nor is this a game casually mastered. Master Gibbons has been tenpin bowling since he was eight, and he competes in nine Tolworth leagues. Miss Furguson, in between extolling the virtues of Tolworth carpets and Tolworth burgers, explained the wonder of the moment, when 35 of the 36 lanes ceased to rumble as the progidy's impossible target of perfection became a possibility. Young Glen, who apparently has neither a bone nor a nerve in his body, shambled to the line and trundled the ball pinwards. He bowls as if he is mildly surprised on the rare occasions that the pins do not all fall down; there is a positiveness and a determination in his manner that are not trivial at all.

Nor are the rewards trivial. You ask Pauline Smith, flower of Tolworth, about the time she won the world championship in New York. "I can't remember the final at all," she said, but her friend and bowling partner, Lesley Potter, filled in the gaps with great relish: "She finished off with three strikes and beat that Japanese into the ground."

Not content to make Tolworth their world, these two have made the world their Tolworth, and though they hated the food in Venezuela, Lesley has a great fondness for Manila.

Men and women do not compete together in tenpin. "Physical strength makes a difference," they agreed. "A difference of 10 to 15 pins over three games."

Nicolle's physical strength seemed to be holding out admirably as he bowled on for the Rams. His habit is to roll along the seventh board of the lane, which argues a habit of precision, since the boards are no more than an inch wide. The technique, he explained, is to make the ball skid for the first part of its journey and to start rotating close to the pins. The first section of the lane is therefore oiled, while the second section is "cross-buffed" to emphasize this effect and to facilitate the task of beating hell out of the five pin with the time-honoured hook-ball.

If this fails to achieve total demolition and a two-ball bonus, pride is salvageable by completing the job with a second roll. A "spare" entitles you to a single-ball bonus. Not an easy task if the extreme right and left pins provokingly remain, but possible. "A fluke you try for", Nicolle said. "If you're dead lucky, one pin bounces off the back and clouts the second. It's something technically known as a shot-or-bust shot".

Jeff Harden had bowled his all for the Rams, and stood aside as John Hughes began his final frame. Strike: two more balls. Both strikes, "'ray!" "We're still in contention", Nicolle said. "We were going really well, but we've gone to pieces a touch on the last few frames".

Final efforts

The competition, like strokeplay golf, was based on totals returned, and all around the air was filled with the sounds of totals being amassed. The 36 lanes were packed with men in their special shirts bearing the team name between the shoulder blades: Sinden Carpets, Home Video Club, Abso Concrete, East India Squadron – all putting their last drops of energy into final efforts to tweak tho totals a few pins higher. Pins crashed, rattled and exploded, palms were slapped, the Tolworth air was punched again and yet again.

Nicolle, shame on him, failed to register a strike with his final frame, but recovered sufficiently for a spare. Entitled to a final delivery, he retrieved his ball without fuss, strolled easily to the line, rolled the ball along the seventh board, and watched as the ball hooked inward and pinward. With a crump and a clatter the 10 of them leapt and fell: strike. Air-punch. Palm-slap. Four call of "'ray!" Harden bought everyone a beer.

BOXING

Gumbs challenges board to give him back his bread

By Srikumar Sen, Boxing Correspondent

"The way I feel I could break down buildings to get to the world title", Roy Gumbs said yesterday. The British and Commonwealth champion did not so much mean that he was aching to demolish the world middleweight champion, Marvin Hagler, but that he was determined to overcome all the obstacles between him and his meeting Hagler.

The man who was the leading European middleweight while Tony Sibson was preparing for Hagler spoke with bitter disillusionment at the British Boxing Board of Control's handling of his attempt to be nominated as a challenger for the European title, vacated by Sibson.

"It is bad enough being overlooked once – but four times!" Gumbs said. "The first time I lost by one vote. The next time the letter from the boxing board never got to the EBU. Then it was a draw and a Frenchman got the deciding vote and now Sibson has been nominated. Two years of my life have been wasted."

One can understand the anger of the tall, soft-spoken St Kitts-born champion, who has done everything asked of him. He won the Lonsdale Belt outright by defending his British title twice and then travelled to Canada and lifted the vacant Commonwealth title by stopping Ralph Hollet, a tough Canadian, picking himself off the floor in the process.

A month later he returned to Canada and defended the title against Hollet, stopping the Canadian in four to show that the first time was no fluke. The Tottenham boxer, unbeaten in his last 18 outings, rose to twelfth place in the world rankings as a result of this good work and had every right to challenge for the European title to get into the top 10 so as to earn the right to face Hagler

Instead of backing Gumbs, the board nominated Sibson to meet Louis Acaries, of France. They could have asked Sibson to stand aside. The Leicester man is world ranked. He has as much use for the title as I have for a Dexter Boot on my parked car. How the board let slip the opportunity of making a two-pronged attack on Hagler is difficult to understand. Gumbs has as much chance as any of beating the world champion.

The board have always made great play of getting the best deal for their boxers. Gumbs can be excused for feeling that he is the exception. "They have not only taken away a big slice of my bread but did not even offer me a biscuit", he said bitterly. Every member of the board I have met has struck me as being a fair man, yet as a body they have failed to live up to this assessment.

"After all, Berbick and Gray, who were Commonwealth champions like me, got shots at the world title", Gumbs said. Let us not forget some of those British heavyweights whom the board allowed into the ring with the greatest, Muhammad Ali.

When Gumbs steps into the ring tonight at the Bloomsbury Crest Hotel against Jerry Holly, of Orlando, Florida, he will be out to back his words with deeds. Holly has a good record. He knocked out the hard-hitting Sammy Nesmith in two rounds; and he has also been in with world-ranked men like Caveman Lee and Curtis Parker.

Gumbs: not even a biscuit

Some years ago when Gumbs applied for a job he was told that the applicant would have to be good at fractions. Since he was no good at maths, like someone else I know, he told his wife he would never succeed at the interview. His wife gave him a crash course in sums and he got the job. If he is threequarters as determined tonight there will be no need to resort to maths to prove his point.

Holly was brought here by Chris Dundee, Angelo's brother. Mr Dundee seemed to be interested in seeing how Errol Christie does against his Nicaraguan middleweight, Lino Cajins. "They say Christie is another Randolph Turpin. Then he must be good. He'll have to be good against my fighter". He did not see him laying out Lino.

Summit plea with a punch

Mr Arum called for a summit at a news conference announcing the World Boxing Association junior middleweight title bout between the champion, Davey Moore, and Roberto Duran at Madison Square Garden on June 16.

The WBA and WBC have clashed repeatedly and have been accused of being unduly influenced by promoters, including Mr Arum and his rival, Don King.

The undefeated Holmes indicated that he would retire if Weaver, the former WBA champion, did not beat the present incumbent Michael Dokes, in Las Vegas on Friday. "I wouldn't fight Dokes," he said, without saying why. "But I think Weaver will win if it goes past four rounds."

RUGBY UNION

Craven's congress

Cape Town (AFP) – An international congress for the Rugby press and media is the latest step in the campaign by Dr Danie Craven, president of the South African Rugby Federation, for the republic's readmission to international sport.

Dr Craven confiemed here yesterday that the congress, which he had hinted at in London at the International Bboard meeting in March, would start in South Africa on August 22 under the chairmanship of Lord Chalfont.

Dr Craven said invitations had also been sent to Sam Armsamy, president of the South Africa Non-Racial Olympic Committee (SAN-ROC) as well as Edwige Avice the French sports minister Neil Macfarlane, her British counterpart.

The congress is to be organnized jointly by the Sonth African Rugby Federation and Tommy Campbell, of Ireland, president of the international Freedom in Sport movement. Dr Craven underlined that his federation had reached a stage where it would now adopt what he called a "hign risk, high reward" policy.

"South Africal rugby has nothing to hide," he said. "We have embarked on a course to do justice to white, black and Coloured rugby and we may even influence this country's society."

Lock-out for Colclough

Auckland (AFP) – The British Lions management denied yesterday any ulterior motive in the continued adsence of Maurice Colclough from the side. Colclough was left out of the lions second game against the powerful Auckland side at Eden park today.

Colclough, who badly damaged a knee during England's international against France in January, has not played since. However, he passed a fitness test before the Lions left London and the manager, Willie John McBride, insisted: "We are not worried about his fitness." But he refused to discuss Colclough's absence further, thus refuelling rumours that the back is having trouble confirming his fitness.

The Lions' management may have had second thoughts about giving Colclough, arguably the best lineout jumper in the party, his first game for more than four months against Andy Hoden and Gary Whetton, the two players likely to comprise the All Blacks' second row in the forthcoming international series, both of whom play for Auckland.

● The Scottish international fly half Ron Wilson is to captain the Middlesex team who start a tour of British Clumbia next week. The tour starts on May 28 with a game against Vancouver Island.

HOCKEY

England to play good neighbours

By Sydney Friskin

There is now every chance that the home countries tournament will be revived. On a proposal made by the Hockey Association the matter is to be discussed on the occasion of the quadrangular tournament in Cardiff on July 15.

The home countries tournament, one of the oldest in the country, was abandoned in 1972 because of England's desire to concentrate on, among other things, Continental opposition. The event at Cardiff gives all four home countries an opportunity to prepare for the European Cup tournament in Amsterdam from August 18 to 28.

England, contrary to earlier expectation, have a chance of gaining more experience before the Amsterdam tournament. Kenya, who will shortly visit the United States, have asked England, Scotland and Wales for fixtures some time at the end of July. England are prepared to entertain the Kenyans provided they can find the cash to do so. Kenya, however, have stipulated that their matches in Britain will not be full internationals.

It is also possible for the England under-21 side to take part in the junior home countries tournament at Aberystwyth on July 9 and 10 before their departure to Lisbon for the junior European Cup qualifying tournament the following weekend. The original intention was to send an England B side to Aberystwyth.

Ireland and Wales will play in another qualifying tournament for the Junior European Cup, in Dublin from September 20 to 25. Their rivals will be Netherlands, Denmark and Switzerland. Two teams will qualify for the main tournament to be held in th summer of 1984. Approval, meanwhile, has been given to England's participation in the junior European indoor championship in 1985.

Ford's, who have been banned from further participation in the national club championship, have threatened to take the Hockey Association to court. They say the association should have suspended the players involved, not the club. The competitions committee of the Hockey Association took action against Ford's after incidents last season in their match against Slough in the club championship, after which the conduct of some Ford's players came under serious review.

YACHTING

Squalls about four recalls

By John Nicholls

For the second time in this windy Weymouth Week the 470 sailors ended the day in disgruntled mood. Their race was eventually abandoned by the race officer after four attempts to start had ended in general recalls. During this time other classes, albeit fewer in numbers, had managed to start successfully in the same conditions on the same starting line.

Afterwards the 470 competitors had numerous explanations for their inability to start properly, most of them blaming the race officer.

Between the rain squalls, good racing was enjoyed by the other classes in this regatta sponsored by National Westminster Banks. Three helmsmen still have unbeaten records: Chris Law in his Soling, Robert White (Tornado) and Stuart Childerley (Laser). Law is taking the opportunity to tune a new boat before he leaves for Newport to join the Victory America's Cup Syndicate.

White seems finally to have established a clear superiority over his father, Reg, a Tornado gold medallist, World champion and supreme catamaran sailor since Robert was a baby. The previous day's Tornado results now have a new look since it was established that the provisional winners had not sailed the correct number of rounds. Robert White thus gained his second win, with his father placed second.

Jo Richards re-established himself at the head of the Flying Dutchman fleet, with another win after his retirement on Monday.

The first three places of the Finn class have been occupied by the same three men each day. Yesterday it was the turn of Roddy Bridge to win.

WEYMOUTH: Soling: 1, C Law; 2, C Simonds; 3, G Ras. Flying Dutchman: 1, J Richards; 2, O Wilkins; 3, P Blake. Tornado: 1, Robert White; 2, W van Staden (Neth); 3, G Deyndam (Neth). Finn: 1, R Bridge; 2, J Greenwood; 3, M McIntyre. Laser: 1, S Childerley; 2, M Riley; 3, A Bond.

Tada ends race on a high note

By Barry Pickthall

Yukoh Tada, the saxophone-playing taxi driver from Tokyo, crossed the Newport finishing line at 10.53 local time yesterday at the end of the BOC single-handed round-the-world yacht race to clinch class two honours by a margin of one day and a half over the American, Francis Stokes.

Tada, whose love for modern art, jazz and saki has made him one of the principal characters in the 27,000-mile race, was injured when he capsized in the Southern Ocean and his sewing machine and saxaphone landed on him as he lay in his bunk. But he recovered after administering acupressure to his bruised body.

At Sydney, the halfway stage, he was third in class, nine days behind Jacques de Roux, but moved into the lead at Rio de Janeiro, the third stop-over port, after the Frenchman's yacht sank midway between New Zealand and Cape Horn.

It was in Rio that Tada himself almost came to grief, for after crossing the finish line his 44ft yacht Loden Okura V ran onto rocks.

He used the lay-over first to repair the damage to the hull, then reshaped the keel in the hope of improving his yacht' windward performance on the last light weather leg back to Newport. Far from speeding his progress, however, the changes slowed the yacht, allowing Stokes the chance to claw back half a day on Tada's time.

Early exit of Panatta

Rome (AP)–Pablo Arraya, of Peru, the ninth seed, beat Adriano Panatta, of Italy, 1-6, 6-4, 7-5 in an emotional first round match in the Italian championships yesterday.

Panatta, making one of his last appearances in front of a home crowd before his promised retirement. He has been the bulwark of Italian tennis for a decade. He won the first set easily and took a 4-2 lead in the second before running out of steam.

"I was losing the match, so I forgot all about Adriano and the crowd, and went for broke," Arraya said. He forced Panatta to the net with deft drop shots and then sent him racing back to the baseline, wearing him out.

The crowd in the Foro Italico broke out into their familiar chant, "Adriano", but it was in vain. Except for his first service, Panatta showed little of his old spectacular skill.

In other first round matches, Thierry Tulasne, of France, knocked out the No 15 seed, Victor Pecci, of Paraguay, 6-2, 6-2, and a young Italian, Francesco Cancellotti, beat Aaron Krickstein, of the United States, a qualifier, 7-6, 6-2.

Meanwhile the organizers of the championships, which have attracted the poorest field for years, announced that the top-seed, Jose Higueras, of Spain, has decided that he is fit enough to play. His appearance was in doubt because of a nagging shoulder strain suffered in a tournament last weekend.

The top seeds go into action for the first time today. Besides Higueras, they include José Luis Clerc, of Argentina, seeded second,

RACING: GOODWOOD FEATURE THE PREDOMINATE STAKES

Piggott poised on Polished Silver

By Michael Phillips, Racing Correspondent

Today's programme at Goodwood is built around the Schroder Life Predominate Stakes, the last recognized Derby trial in this country before the all-important day at Epsom in a fortnight. Time alone will tell whether the race has the sort of bearing that it did in 1979 when Troy took this particular path on his way to greater glory at Epsom.

What is clear is that today's race will help Lester Piggott to sort out his plans which will be useful because, with eight Derby victories already to his name, the champion jockey is an important bit of the annual classic jigsaw puzzle.

With Dunbeath dropping by the wayside at York a week ago, Piggott and Henry Cecil are now looking to Polished Silver to salvage something from the wreckage. The winner of all his four races as a two-year old, Polished Silver encountered the first and only defeat of his career at Sandown last month when he finished only fourth in the Guardian Classic Trial.

Three things prompt me to excuse him for that failure and side with him now: firstly, the appalling conditions underfoot at Sandown; secondly the ludicrously slow gallop at which that race was run; thirdly the well-catalogued fact that Polished Silver is such a lazy horse at home that he could only have needed the race badly that day.

Tolomeo and Gordian were two of Polished Silver's immediate victims last year which gives an insight to his true potential. Furthermore, Piggott has chosen to ride Polished Silver in preference to Cecil's other runner, John French, who also won four races last year. On his reappearance John French finished in front of The Liquidator in the Warren Stakes at Epsom, where they were both put in their place by Harty and Shanipour, neither of whom contest today's race.

With Gordian, Cock Robin and Gorytus arguably their first strings for the Derby, Guy Harwood, Michael Stoute and Dick Hern are feeling the strength of the opposition by running Dawn River, Putney Bridge and Morcon. Of these, only Morcon is still engaged in the Derby. He ran really well in his only race as a two-year-old when he was runner-up to Dunbeath on this course last July but he disappointed when only eighth behind Shearwalk in the Heathorn Stakes at Newmarket on 1,000 Guineas Day. Allowing for the improvement that race should have wrought, Morcon can be expected to make a much bolder show this afternoon, especially as he is still able to claim a useful maiden's allowance.

The word from Pulborough is that Dawn River, who is a full brother to Vigors, a top-class horse over middle distances in the United States, is fit and fancied; but he has quite a lot to make up on his two-year-old form if he is to beat John French, let alone Polished Silver.

Putney Bridge, Stoute's runner, was trained by Edward O'Grady in Ireland last year. He won his only race at Leopardstown, beating Storm Bird's expensive, but disappointing, full-brother Ballydoyle. Again he seems to have plenty to find on that form, but our Newmarket correspondent says that he has been shaping well.

Rock's Gate is still undefeated after various ventures to Leicester, Wolverhampton and Bath. I saw him win the Somerset Stakes on the last-named course and he could hardly have been more impressive. He clearly revels in the prevailing soft conditions underfoot, but Polished Silver is preferred on balance of form.

Still on the classic front there should be no lack of interest in the proceedings at The Curragh on Saturday when the Irish 1,000 Guineas and the Gallinule will be the main attraction. Five fillies trained in England – Annie Edge, Favoridge, Goodbye Shelley, Gabibti and Nibabu were among the 26 who stood their ground yesterday for the Irish 1,000 at the four-day stage.

Included in that number was the remarkable Irish filly, Give Thanks, who has already won twice in Ireland this season, as well as the Oaks Trial at Lingfield and Musidora Stakes at York. This time her connexions have a choice of engagement because they have also left her in the Gallinule Stakes. It would be asking a lot of Give Thanks to revert to a mile, after her exploits over much further in England last week.

If she is pulled out again I hope that it will be for the Gallinule, over a mile and a half, as then she really could tell us the time of the day about Vincent O'Brien's three acceptors Caerleon, Salford and South Atlantic, not to mention the recent easy winner Observatory Hill who will, I gather, be ridden by Lester Piggott.

Improving Fine Sun adds to Mr Hobson's choice catch

By John Karter

Those cynical souls who could be heard muttering darkly that there was something fishy about the result of the featured Clive Graham Stakes at Goodwood yesterday were absolutely right. The surprise winner, Fine Sun, is owned by Bill Hobson, a wholesale fish merchant from Grimsby, and the throng of people crowding around him in the unsaddling enclosure were no doubt trying to get as close as possible so that a little of his phenomenal luck would rub off.

Mr Hobson has had only two horses carrying his ble and red colours so far – Fine Sun and the unbeaten Our Dynasty, whom many regard as the best two-year-old seen out this season. However, this likely lad from Humberside has another two-year-old called Mandarin Bay ready to whisk those lucky silks along at Doncaster on Whit Monday. And although the man himself says that a third money spinner is too much to hope for, perhaps that should not stop us taking out those second mortgages to back him.

As for Fine Sun, he seem to improve with age, like a fine wine. Yesterday's success was the eighth of his career, and his winnings now tota some £60,000. True, Farioffa, who was the race course whisper that everyone seemed to known about, was not given the best of rides by Willie Carson and finished very fast, but Pat Eddery, on Fine Sun, was out flat to the boards at the end.

Fine Sun will run next in noe of three races: the Zetland Gold Cup at Redcar, Brigadier Gerard Stakes at Sandown or Epsom's Daily Mirror Handicap, depending where Eddery is available to ride him. After that, Mr Hobson will be hot-footing it to the Grimsby branch of Moss Brow, where he will swop wellies and sou'wester for topper and tails in order to watch Fine Sun run in the Prince of Wales' Stakes at Royal Ascot.

Our Dynasty will also be seen at the royal meeting, where he will contest the Coventry Stakes. This will follow a preliminary run in a newly instituted six-furlong race at Kempton evening meeting next Monday.

No wonder Mr Hobson is following Eddery around wherever he goes – the Irishman's touch is almost more King Midas-like than his own at present. Eddery rode two other winners yesterday – Jasper in the Levin Down Maiden Stakes and Roman Beach in the Ripolin Handicap – to continue his golden run.

Jasper strolled home ahead of the Queen's cold Red Duster and the hot favourite, Grizabella. Even though John Dunlop, his trainer, did not consider him good enough to leave in the Derby, he could be well above average. The Irish Derby could yet be on his agenda. Dunlop, in fact, is now almost certain to run only Wassl at Epsom, because Russian Roubles, his other possible, "will not run anywhere until the ground dries up."

Edder had to use all his strength and skill to force Roman Beach past Lester Piggott, and Star of Ireland, in the dying strides of the Ripolin Handicap. In so doing, they landed a huge gamble for connexions who backed him down from 2-1 to 6-4 and, apparently, took at least £50,000 out of the ring.

Paul Kelleway showed us a useful-looking two-year-old in the shape of Daniel Wildenstein's Altdorfer, who easily won the Tegleaze Maiden Stakes. Unfortunately, Kelleway has not entered him for anything special because the colt arrived at his stables with what the trainer described as a leg the shape of a banana.

Alexandrie an Oaks possible

By Desmond Stoneham, French Racing Correspondent

Alexandrie looked like a top-class filly when winning yesterday's Prix Cleopatre at Saint Cloud. She cruised home by three lengths from Aunty and the daughter of Val de l'Orne may line up for the Oaks at Epsom on June 4. But Alec Head her trainer advises caution. He said: "There is a possibility that she goes to Epsom but her owner, Mr Wertheimer, does not like to travel."

Certainly in the opinion of her jockey Freddie Head, Alexandrie could have the necessary talent to perform well in the English classic. He remarked after the race: "She's got a lot of class, excellent acceleration but is still a little green."

Alexandrie was raced to second position behind Mulaz for much of the group three event, but when asked to go on soon after entering the straight she immediately showed a clean pair of heels to her six rivals.

Law Report May 18 1983

Queen's Bench Division

Creditor cannot retain joint tenant's deeds

Thames Guaranty Ltd v Campbell and Others
Before Mr Justice Mann
[Judgment delivered May 12]

The deposit of title deeds with a creditor by one joint tenant without the consent of the other was not an effective deposit since the creditor was not entitled to retain custody of the deeds until the debt was paid, Mr Justice Mann held in the Queen's Bench Division, when giving judgment for the fourth defendant, Laurel May Campbell, against the plaintiffs on the fourth defendant's counter-claim.

The plaintiffs claimed against the first defendant, Theophillus Count Campbell, money lent to him by the plaintiffs as his bankers. The second and third defendants did not play any part in the proceedings.

The fourth defendant who was the wife of the first defendant, brought a counter-claim against the plaintiffs for an order that the plaintiffs deliver up to her the land certificate relating to property held by the first and fourth defendant as joint tenants.

Mr John Boggis for the plaintiffs; the first defendant in person; Mr A. V. B. Bartlett for the fourth defendant.

MR JUSTICE MANN said that the plaintiffs, a company in liquidation, had carried on business as bankers, and between August 24, 1972 and March 22, 1976 had granted overdraft facilities to the first defendant, who was an undischarged bankrupt.

The matrimonial home of the first and fourth defendants was a terraced house. Shortly after purchasing the leasehold interest, they purchased the freehold reversion. The cheque of £975 for the freehold was met by the plaintiffs on the understanding that the title deeds of the property would be lodged with them as security.

The purchase of the freehold was completed and documents of title were sent to the Land Registry. The land certificate and pre-registration deed were then sent to the plaintiffs and the first defendant was informed of that fact.

There was no doubt that the first defendant authorized the deposit of the documents of title with the plaintiffs. However, the plaintiffs conceded that the fourth defendant neither consented to or even knew of the deposit until some years later.

The use of overdraft facilities by the first defendant with interest produced an indebtedness of £9,594 on March 22, 1976. Using agreed interest rates, the indebtedness on May 9, 1983 had enlarged to £34,362.

The fourth defendant's counter-claim had caused argument as to whether the plaintiffs had an equitable charge over the first defendant's beneficial interest.

The plaintiffs contended that a charge was created on the basis of an evinced intention to charge whatever beneficial interest it was the first defendant had in the property. Alternatively, it was argued that the deposit of documents of title had the same effect.

Having considered the overdraft facility letters in the light of authorities on the nature of an equitable charge, his Lordship could not find in them the creation of a charge. There was the promise of a charge and an assumption that the promise had been fulfilled.

The promise was supported by consideration and if it was specifically enforceable, it would have created an equitable charge. The court could order specific performance of a contract at the instance of an innocent purchaser to the extent of the vendor's interest. There was no reason why an innocent person who had given consideration for the promise of a charge should not be treated in a position equivalent to that of a purchaser and thus secure an order for partial performance.

Any order would be for the creation of a charge on the first defendant's beneficial interest. The ability of a person to whom a charge was promised to secure an order for partial performance was subject to a discretion of the court.

Having regard to Cedar Holdings Ltd v Green ([1981] Ch 129) where the Court of Appeal held that partial performance in that case would have been refused as prejudicial to the wife, then so must it be here.

Turning to the plaintiffs' alternative argument, the authorities were silent on the question whether one joint owner could by depositing the title documents with the consent of the other thereby charge his beneficial interest.

In his Lordship's judgment, the deposit of title deeds with a creditor did not operate as an equitable charge unless the deposit was an effective one. A deposit was an effective one if the creditor could retain custody until his debt was paid. The deposit of title deeds by one joint tenant without the consent of the other was not effective in that sense.

Joint owners of a legal estate were jointly entitled to the custody of the title deeds relating to that estate. The two were trustees of the deeds no less than they were of the legal estate.

The fourth defendant was at all times entitled to request the return of the documents of title to the joint custody of herself and the first defendant.

Accordingly, the first defendant did not create an equitable charge over his beneficial interest to the property and the delivery up of the title deeds to the first and fourth defendants must follow.

Appeal excluded by telex terms

Arab African Energy Corporation Ltd v Olie Produkten Nederland BV
Before Mr Justice Leggatt
[Judgment delivered May 12]

A valid agreement excluding the right of appeal to the courts within section 3(1) of the Arbitration Act 1979 was capable of being incorporated by a reference to standard rules containing such a clause into an agreement of sale concluded by telex messages.

Mr Justice Leggatt so held in the Queen's Bench Division refusing an application for leave to appeal against an arbitration and made by Mr N. A. Phillips, QC, an arbitrator, on February 4, 1983.

The Arbitration Act 1950, provides by section 32: "In this part of the Act ... the expression "arbitration agreement' means a written agreement to submit present or future differences to arbitration."

The Arbitration Act 1979 provides, by section 3: "(1) (a) the High Court shall not ... grant leave to appeal with respect to a question of law arising out of an award ... if the parties to the reference in question have entered into an agreement in writing ... which excludes the right of appeal under section 1 above in relation to that award ...".

Mr Anthony Diamond, QC and Mr Simon Crookenden for the applicant sellers; Mr Steven Gee for the buyers.

MR JUSTICE LEGGATT said that the parties had made a contract on December 30, 1980 for the sale of gas oil. The contract was made orally by brokers on behalf of the two parties, and was confirmed by telex messages to the parties by one of the firms of brokers.

The telex set out the terms of the cotract and included the provision: "Inco terms 1980. English law – arbitrator, if any, London according ICC rules."

There occurred disputes between the parties, which were referred to an arbitrator, who on February 4, 1983 made his award. The sellers sought to appeal against the award. Whether they could do so depended on whether or not the International Chamber of Commerce rules were incorporated by reference into the agreement as concluded by telex.

Article 24 of the ICC rules states: "By submitting the dispute to arbitration by the International Chamber of Commerce, the parties shall be deemed ... to have waived their right to any form of appeal in so far as such waiver can validly be made."

"Written agreement" under section 32 of the 1950 Act had been interpreted so as to permit the incorporation of an arbitration clause by reference in a contract to a particular form of contract which itself provided for arbitration.

The words "agreement in writing" in section 3(1) of the 1979 Act bore the same meaning as the words "written agreement" in section 32 of the 1950 Act, that is, a written expression adopted by the parties of an agreement reached between them or their agents.

In Frank Fehr & Co v Kassam Jivraj & Co Ltd (1949 82 Lloyd's Rep 673) Lord Greene, Master of the Rolls, said that what was required was writing, recognizing, incorporating or confirming the existence of an agreement ..."

The phrase "an agreement in writing ... which excludes the right of appeal" in section 3(1) of the 1979 Act was apt to apply to an exclusion agreement incorporated by reference.

The adoption of the agreement by both parties constituted it as one which had been "entered into" for the purposes of the section, without the necessity for signatures by each of the parties.

Public policy in relation to arbitration proceedings had changed as a result of the 1979 Act. Formerly the court was careful to maintain its supervisory jurisdiction over arbitration awards. That aspect of public policy had given way to the need for finality, and to commercial expediency.

Two cases decided by the European Court of Justice were of persuasive authority against the principle of incorporation by reference: Estasis Salotti v RUWA ([1976] ECR 1831), and Segoura v Bonakdarian ([1976] ECR 1861), which took a strict view that a consensus as to the country of jurisdiction over disputes between parties to an oral contract should be evidenced by a specific written acceptance.

However in this essentially domestic context the broader approach of the common law was to be preferred. It was more important that commercial men should know that the English courts were consistent than that the courts should turn towards Luxembourg when Parliament had not directed them to do so.

Whoever wins, buyers won't benefit

Home owners stand to get little from the election. No matter which way you vote, don't expect to see a package of reforms aimed at making home ownership any more attractive than it is already. In fact the election is likely to do just the opposite.

It does seem clear now that all the political parties will make inroads into at least some of the financial rewards which come with home ownership. Since the Conservative government was elected in May 1979 some of these advantages have already disappeared – with a little help from inflation.

During the pre-election scramble for votes last time, leading Conservatives, including Sir Geoffrey Howe, agreed that the mortgage tax threshhold was too low at £25,000. They strongly hinted at an increase in this limit, which had been set in 1974.

Figures of £40,000 and £50,000 were bandied about, but since those heady days little happened until the last Budget. Finally, bending to pressure from house builders and the public alike, Sir Geoffrey raised the threshhold to £30,000.

Unfortunately for this particular piece of legislation the timing of the election could not have been worse: to push through essential business before Parliament was dissolved, the Government agreed to suspend parts of the Finance Bill and with it went the extra tax relief.

If the Conservatives are returned on June 9, it is almost certain that they will reinstate the clause at the earliest opportunity. Anyway, tax codes have already been adjusted, so most taxpayers are already receiving the extra relief.

If either of the other parties is returned it is unlikely thet a higher threshhold will find its way on to the statute books. Such a move could herald an unprecedented examination of the whole private sector housing subsidy system.

Most home owners who pay tax at above the basic rate also receive relief on their mortgage interest at a higher rate. Within property circles it is now believed that all the parties, including the Conservatives, are looking at ways of abolishing this extra relief. This would mean everyone getting the same tax relief at the basic rate, currently 30 per cent.

Interestingly, this would hit the younger house buyer who invariably finds, especially in London and the South-east, that prices have risen so much over the last five years they have to take out larger mortgages. Older owners are affected less because they have usually been in the same house for some years, and they bought when prices were low and therefore have a small mortgage.

Moves to restrict private sector housing subsidies are less harmful when interest rates are low, but throughout most of the last government's adminstration the cost of borrowing was extremely high, averaging about 13 per cent. Although present mortgage rates at about 10 per cent are regarded as being low, they are 50 per cent higher than six years ago.

Home owners are also unlikely to escape stamp duty, the punitive tax which hits those who move house. The last government raised the threshold at which stamp duty becomes payable from £15,000 to £25,000, but with average prices advancing to more than £27,000 an increasing number of people find they have to pay.

Various reforms of the system, aimed at lessening the burden, have been suggested but the Government has turned a deaf ear.

If Labour is returned on June 9, home owners and potential owners are likely to find the going tough because higher rates of tax relief are expected to be phased out fairly early on in the administration. More money would be pumped into the public sector and the "right to buy" scheme, successfully implemented by the Conservatives, quickly abandoned.

Although the SDP-Liberal Alliance is a less-known quantity, it is generally believed that it too would phase out higher rate relief for house owners, although there may be compensations in the form of higher tax thresholds to appease its mainly middle-class voters.

It is interesting to see how housing, especially private housing, has become an important election issue. Partly the Conservatives brought this on to themselves through their drive to encourage more people to become owner-occupiers. Through various pieces of legislation, for which the last government cannot take all the blame, more and more young people have been pushed into the market as first-time buyers. They would expect to be treated similarly to their parents when it comes to housing subsidies.

There is also the possibility that the abandonment of higher rate tax relief could dampen house prices, especially in the upper ranges. Buyers calculate the house they can afford based on the net cost of the mortgage, and if this is going to rise expectations will have to be lowered.

A Kazakh tribesman: Inside China (ITV 9.10pm)

● Granada's INSIDE CHINA series (ITV 9.10pm) comes to a close with an excellent documentary about a family of the Kazakh race – a once fiercely independent people who live a nomadic existence in north-west China between Mongolia and Tibet. When the communists took over China in 1949, the Kazakhs, along with other isolated tribal minorities, were either persuaded or forced to toe the party line. This meant disposing of all trappings of wealth and the necessity to join a commune. Abdar Qair and his family are now happily integrated into the communist way of life and the programme joins them as they are packing-up their winter quarters in the foothills to move to their summer home higher in the Tian Shan mountains. The programme vividly illustrates the family way of life from the healthy, rosy-cheeked youngsters to the fierce-looking elder who still hunts rabbits and foxes with eagles. Milking mares, branding yaks, shopping in a bazaar and at school. In fact every facet of daily Kazakh life is covered in this fascinating film of a remote people.

● BBC Bristol's entertaining wildlife magazine series WILDTRACK (BBC 1 5.10pm) makes a welcome return with Mike Jordan defending the much-maligned (by gardeners) mole and Su Ingle diving to the depths in a mini-submarine to examine the seemingly grotesque denizens of the deep like the hatchetmouth and the stalkeye.

● For his first play for radio, THE MARIJUANA KID (Radio 4 3.02pm) John McKenzie has chosen a subject of which he has first-hand experience – boxing. Gerard Kelly stars as Harry Burns, a young, unemployed schoolteacher with a wife and child to support. With time on his hands and a need for an outlet for his pent-up frustrations, Harry decides to train with the local amateur boxing club. McKenzie's experience of such places stands him in good stead here and he captures the atmosphere of the gym perfectly. Harry is an unlikely candidate for the boxing ring, with baseball boots, pin-striped vest, glasses and long hair, but nevertheless a bout is arranged for him. His initial enthusiasm turns to apprehension and, with some comical moments, the play comes to typical boy's adventure story end.

9.00 Film: Weekend (1967) starring Mireille Darc, Jean Yanne and Jean-Pierre Leaud. The final film in the short season of Jean-Luc Godard-directed films is a very black comedy about a young, well-off couple, intent on disposing of one another. Uproar as lord mayor is axed

Demonstrators gathered nutside Liverpool Town Hall as retiring Lord Mayor Mr Stanley Airey chaired his final meeting. He will be replaced by a council chairman, nr what npponeuts have dnbbed a "comrade commissar".

Mr Hugh Dalton, a Labour member, beat Mr Charles Hutchinson, the Liberal Lord Mayor-elect, by three votes to become the council chairman.

Mr Hutchinson, who had already been measured for his mayoral robes, said later: "I am disappointed, but mainly for the city of Liverpool".

Sir Trevor Jones, the deposed Liberal leader of the council, told members: "The first item on the agenda is the election of the lord mayor, not chairman, commissar or call him what you will".

He said it was despicable that the people who voted Labour to power had oot been told of the plan to scrap the lord mayor.

"The Labnur Party seem deliberately tn want to downgrade this city in the eyes of the world. They want to relegate the city nf Liverpool tn the status nf an eastern banana republic", he said.

Mr John Hamilton, the Labour leader, said the cost of having a lord mayor had risen since the Liberals opposed the expense involved 10 years ago.

The cost nf runnng the lord mayor's cars had gone up from £5,000 in 1973 to £36,300, the civil hospitality allnwance from £300 a week to £30,600 a year, and the lord maynr's coach and hnrses from £4,000 to £22,700 a year.

"The office of lord mayor disappeared under the Local Government Act of 1973, an act brought in by a Conservative government", Mr Hamilton said. "All that remains is the right to use the title if the holder nf the position of chairman so wishes.

"The questinn of whn has abolished a lord mayor has already been determined; uot by us, but by a Conservative gnvernment."

The 2in TV you can watch on the bus

By Kenneth Gosling

A new piece of Japanese technology is about to invade Britain: a portable television set so tiny it can be carried around in the pocket and used almost anywhere outside the home. It comes complete with earphones and is designed to operate anywhere a normal televison signal can be picked up.

Sony, is launching its "Watchman" – the visual companion to its highly successful "Walkman" personal portable stereo cassette player – in two weeks. It will sell for about £249.

Sony has leapt into the lead with the "flat display" tube because its main British rival is being held up by the five-week sit-in at the Timex plant in Dundee, where it is due to be produced.

The Watchman weighs a little over 1lb, has a two-inch screen, measures 7¼in by 3½in by 1½in and looks rather like a walkie-talkie. Testing the set yesterday, The Times found it operated inside a bus, and on the back seat of a car with engine running. The picture began to break up while the car was moving, but the viewer could still follow what was happening.

Bus queues, bars, parks and even cricket grounds are likely to sprout the Watchman, for it has been a huge success in the United States and Japan, where Sony says some stores have been charging premium prices.

Four alkaline batteries or a single rechargable Sony unit will power the set for 2½ hours, (12 hours without a picture) and an AC power adaptor is supplied for mains use.

Will there be a colour version? "Already under development, but it may take some time", Sony said.

Kohl delays meeting of EEC leaders

The decision followed a telephone conversation between Mrs Thatcher and Dr Kohl on Mnnday and consultatinns between the German Chancellor and President Mitterand. The European leaders apparently agreed that discussion would not have been enhanced by xhe proximity of the British electinn.

● STRASBOURG: The postpouement indicates that Herr Kohl, in his sounidings round the capitals of Europe, had been unable to establish any certainty that there would be an agreement on the size nf Britain's rebate when EEC foreign ministers meet nn the issue in Brussels next Tuesday Ian Stewart writes.

Hever Castle suit to be loaned to the Tower

By Geraldine Norman, Sale Room Correspondent

The superb suit of Milanese sixteenth century armour sold from the Hever Castle collection 10 days ago for £1.92m is to be offered on loan to the Tower Armouries in Loudon.

Its purchaser, Mr B. H. Trupin, a New York investment banker, said yesterday that he had only realized the interest the English took in the armour when reading an article as he travelled towards London on Concorde on Monday.

He told The Times that he had decided to see if the Tower Armouries would like to show it for three tn five years. Mr G. M. Wilson, the deputy master of the Armnuries, said yesterday that they would very much like to have it on shnw.

It will not reach the Tower that soon, however, because the armour went on exhibition yesterday at Sutton Place, near Guildford, the Tudor manor house which used to belong to J. Paul Getty and now belongs to a trust financed by Mr Stanley J. Seeger, another American millionaire.

The exhibition, "The Renaissance at Sutton Place" was npened last night by the Prince of Wales, and the armour remains on view until September 18. Mr Trupin discovered that his sensational purchase also entitled him to dine with the Prince and Pricess of Wales.

He is discovering that the purchase of so famons an item is causing ripples in his life. In the first place he has revealed his identity, which is not his usual practice after years nf collecting.

As well as collecting works of art he has a passion for Rolls-Royces and owns seven "older models". He drives a 1934 Phantom II when in the UK and has three 1950s Silver Wraiths which he uses daily in New York. Sale Room, page 2

Frank Johnson's campaign trail

Beneath Gladstone's piercing stare

Mrs Thatcher will not be starting her campaign in the country at large until Friday. On that day she will start flying missions over Britain in her party's campaign aeroplane: the Discorde.

Yesterday she ventured out briefly from No 10 to the ops room at Central Office to raise morale among ground crew and to choose the targets. No town is safe.

Unlike Biggin Hill, ground crew at Central Office tend to have such names as Araminta ffrench-Leave. They are recruited from the flower of home counties womanhood. They are a cheerful, hard-working, hard-swearing lot, who will work around the clock until the British surrender. But of the Prime Minister's visit to them yesterday, more later.

What of the moderate enemy? The spokesmen of the Liberal-Social Democratic Alliance are addressing us each morning of the campaign amid the marmoreal glories of the National Liberal Club.

A visit there is always an enobling experience. These days it is a very large building containing a very small political party. Yesterday we made our way up the overpowering curve of the marble staircase to a soaring, pillared chamber containing Gladstone, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Asquith, Dr David Owen, Mr David Penhaligan and Lord Tordoff.

A fine statue of John Hampden thrusting out a sword pointed the way to the washrooms. Copies of the Alliance manifesto fluttered amid the cavernous leather armchairs of the document, an appreciative leader in The Sunday Times had observed: "This is a blueprint from the laboratories of moderation".

The National Liberal Club, to our relief, did not seem the sort of place to include many laboratories among its facilities. In any case, are laboratories the sort of places from which blueprints come? Surely blueprints come from drawing offices? Perhaps readers with specialized knowledge would care tn write a letter putting me right about this.

Lord Tordoff, a liberal peer, welcomed us. He seemed an amiable figure. Unfortunately neither Gladstone, nor Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman nor Asquith seemed to have the remotest idea who he was.

"Labour is the party of verbal elastoplast and they can't even stitch up their divisions". Dr Owen began. At this piece of phrase-making, Gladstone at the other end of the room fixed him with a terrible eye.

But Dr Owen recovered from this dreadful start to give a lucid and persuasive exposition of Alliance policy on a variety of matters. If at the end we could not remember what Alliance policy was on these matters, that was the fault of the policy rather than of Dr Owen.

We set out for the Labour Party. It was rumoured that the Alliance, with characteristic generosity, had laid on a bus to make sure we got to their opponents on time. We piled on to the bus.

As it started, an Alliance lady inquired: "You are going to Wandsworth, aren't you?" "What's happening in Wandsworth?" we asked. "A walkabout", she replied. We all piled off the bus.

By the time we got to Labour, Mr Healey was yet again saying. Dr Witteveen, who was head of the IMF in my time..." Some of us fled to the Tories. No activity was yet expected there, since they were starting their campaign later than the others. But then came Mrs Thatcher's unexpected descent.

Thatcher reviews crack forces

Mr Cecil Parkinson, the Conservative Party chairman, showed her with pride the crack forces at his command. "This is Catherine", he told her. "Catherine is monitoring the Alliance for us, Prime Minister. She's going to their press conferences". Catherine was very pretty. Let us hope that no lecherous moderate lout will try to monitor Catherine.

Then Mrs Thatcher addressed the massed ranks. In an implicit reference to the Mori poll that had shown her lead halved, Mrs Thatcher mentioned "the opinion polls which you read and I read". She added: Somewhere in the middle of the campaign there will be a very rough passage. That is the point of time where we have to stay absolutely calm, stay absolutely together".

That could have been a rather alarming reference to this aeroplane.

Voting by post

Some people who are not able to get to their polling stations to vote in persoo at the general election on June 9 may qualify to vote by post.

British subjects and citizens of the Republic of Ireland who are resident here and whose names are on the electoral register may vote at the electioo if they are aged 18 or over on that day.

Those who may apply to vote by post are registered electors who are disabled; or registered blind persons, or those likely to be too ill to go to the polling station. An elector likely to be away from his or her constituency on polling day because of his or her job, for example a long-distance lorry driver, can also apply for a postal vote.

Electors who have moved house from one electoral division to another since October 10 last year (September 15 in Northern Ireland) may also apply for a postal vote.

Anyone who thinks he or she may be o one of these categories should ask the acting Returning Officer of the constituency for a form of application immediately.

The completed form must reach the electoral registration officer of the district in which the elector is registered by noon on Friday, May 20. If the electoral registration officer grants the application the ballot paper will be sent nearer election day.

Being on holiday away from home does not make an elector eligible for a postal vote. No one can vote by post from overseas, and once a postal vote has been granted it is illegal to vote in person.
